purpose of the fourteenth amendment was the protection of the black man in the Southern States, and that it applied only to cases of disqualification that could be made because of some inherent quality or characteristic that might be in the person himself, not something extrinsic, not something that was under his own control. And after a discussion of the power of Congress to exclude Representatives from any of the States because of the various qualifications required by them for the exercise of the right of suffrage, Congress took no action but then said that if after the passage of that act any State should violate the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution, its representation should be proportionately decreased.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. COX. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to conclude his remarks. I understand that he is nearly through.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman from Massachusetts proceeding?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBINSON. I thank the House for its courtesy, and will try not to weary the patience of members.

The fourteenth amendment requires that to be entitled to vote a person shall be a citizen of full age and shall not have participated in rebellion or other crime. Now, I say that except as to race, color, or previous condition of servitude, it is now within the power of the States to prescribe the qualifications of the voter as much as it was before the adoption of that amendment.

There may be certain requirements of the States, and there are all over the country, such as residence, prepayment of a tax, registration, good behavior, good character, educational qualifications, freedom from idiocy, insanity, or pauperism—that is public support as a pauper—and also convicts are excluded.

Now, what does the fourteenth amendment provide, if gentlemen desire to give it a literal construction? It provides that when the right to vote shall be denied to any of the male inhabitants of a State, &c. Inhabitants! There is not a lawyer who does not know that a man may become an inhabitant of a State by settling in it in one-half day, if he goes there with the intention of making it his home. It is intention that determines inhabitancy.

Mr. KEIFER. Intention determines residence.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is correct. He may go there to dwell; he may settle there; and if you provide that he shall have the right to vote without any previous term of residence, down go all your registry laws, all your requirements depending upon a previous residence in the State; and therefore in that way it would be very convenient in some States, when it was desired they should go republican and they could not quite carry it, to have 25,000 voters come across the borders from a very strong republican State; or it might perhaps assist the democrats under similar circumstances with the conditions reversed. But nobody wants that.

As the gentleman from Georgia said lately, in regard to the qualifications of residents and tax-payers, there has been no change since the foundation of the Government. It is safe and best that this matter should be left to the policy of the different States to determine for themselves. We have gone on in safety from the foundation of the Government to the present time, without disturbance or violence, only as to the lately enslaved race, and we have never sought to make any alteration in the power of the Legislatures of the States to determine the qualifications for voting. And I submit that now is not the time to do it. I am glad that the time is fast receding when in my judgment it will ever be deemed necessary to do it. I will pass on and talk about the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. FINLEY. Before the gentleman leaves this point of his argument, may I ask him a question without interrupting his line of argument?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. FINLEY. It is whether in his view the State of South Carolina or the State of North Carolina, reconstructed States, may or may not require under the Constitution a property qualification or an educational qualification, as well as the State of Massachusetts?

Mr. ROBINSON. I am not here to give opinions——

Mr. FINLEY. I want your views.

Mr. BRIGGS. I thought that was what you were giving.

Mr. ROBINSON. I was about to say that I was not here to give opinions on supposed cases; but I am ready to state what I believe about it, for all that, if the House will bear with me.

Mr. REAGAN rose.

Mr. ROBINSON. One at a time. I will leave that question with the States, to be determined by them in their wisdom, according to their judgment of a proper policy. As I read the Constitution and its amendments as they stand to-day, I believe it is in the power of the States to prescribe the qualifications of the voters and the prerequisites of the exercise of the right of suffrage, so only that they do not deprive their States of a republican form of government, and so only that they do not deprive any person of the right to vote because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Mr. FINLEY. Take the case I put, of a property qualification or an educational qualification.

Mr. ROBINSON. I submit in reply to the gentleman that to my apprehension I have answered his question.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman will allow me—I do not know that I have followed his argument very closely—I desire to know whether he means to be understood as arguing that the phrase "citizens of the United States," in the first clause of the fourteenth amendment, applies only to black people, and does not apply to white people?

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, no, sir. I have not made any such statement. I have not said anything about the first section of the fourteenth article of the constitutional amendments. I have not alluded to that, because there is so much to be said about it. Some gentlemen claim that under the first section, giving certain privileges and immunities to citizens of the United States, citizens can do almost anything as against any possible rights of the State authorities. That question has been fully discussed by the Supreme Court of the United States, in the Slaughter House cases, to which I commend the attention of the gentleman. As to the latitude of construction put upon that provision, we have an illustration from the State of Iowa. A man in that State claimed that it was his right to sell intoxicating liquor contrary to the laws of the State, because, as he alleged, it was one of his privileges and immunities as a citizen of the United States. He brought the question up to the Supreme Court of the United States, and I will only add that the Supreme Court said he was wrong.

Mr. REAGAN. I did not put any question that called for such a response as that. I simply wanted to know whether in the general scope of the gentleman's argument it was not his purpose to show that the words "citizen of the United States" as used in the fourteenth amendment apply merely to colored people, and not to citizens of the United States in general.

Mr. ROBINSON. The gentleman says he has not heard my argument. I beg he will not ask me to repeat it, because the fatigue which I should thereby inflict upon many other gentlemen would not be compensated by any possible gratification I might afford the gentleman.

Mr. REAGAN. I supposed the gentleman would answer my question without evasions of that kind.

Mr. ROBINSON. I evade nothing.

Now I pass on to speak of the requirements for the exercise of suffrage in the State of Massachusetts. I know that in this House there is no hostility to the old Bay State. I know that the people of the Union regard that as a well-governed and well-ordered State. I know that they rejoice in her prosperity and in her history. Her own sons may be pardoned, perhaps, if they have a little pride in her renown and her success. Massachusetts requires that a person in order to vote shall have attained the age of twenty-one years; that he shall not be a pauper—in other words, shall not be supported as a public charge, and shall not be under guardianship; that he shall have resided in the State a year and in the town or city in which he offers to vote six months next preceding; that he shall have paid a State or county tax within two years next preceding, (which I may say parenthetically does not, as the law now is, require him to pay more than $1 in two years;) that he shall be able to read the constitution of the Commonwealth in the English language and to write his name. With the exception of the educational qualification, those requirements in all essential particulars have been the law of that Commonwealth for more than sixty years. During the years of the war and the era of reconstruction every one of them, including the educational qualification, was a part of our constitution. Let me read the educational qualification as defined in the amendments of our constitution:

No person shall have the right to vote or be eligible to office under the constitution of this Commonwealth who shall not be able to read the constitution in the English language and write his name: Provided, however, That the provisions of this amendment shall not apply to any person prevented by a physical disability from complying with its requirements, nor to any person who now has the right to vote, nor to any person who shall be sixty years of age or upward at the time this amendment shall take effect.

That amendment was adopted in 1857, and stands as a part of the State constitution to-day. The act of the Legislature, if one was needed to enforce it, was recommended in 1859, was passed in 1860, and has remained unchanged in this particular to this day. So that from 1857 to 1881 that provision has stood in the constitution of our State. No man can vote there who is not enrolled upon the lists of voters prior to the election. I presume that this is the law in most of the States. Lists of voters are carefully made.

Now, I ask attention to this matter, because my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. COX] used in his speech the following language:

The report of the minority in the Massachusetts election case claimed that of the 376,332 citizens of the United States 136,859 were disfranchised from other causes than criminality, idiocy, and insanity, the causes being illiteracy and failure to pay tax and pauperism. This is indeed startling, if true. It would be more so if the other disfranchised, idiots, &c., were added, as by parity of reasoning they should be. Leaving out those above excepted and adding aliens, it was claimed that 105,109 citizens had their immunities abridged and could not vote.

My friend from New York was very careful and prudent, as I submit he always is, not to give his personal indorsement to that statement. He said those figures were "startling, if true." That would have been a very proper comment after reading the story of "Sinbad, the Sailor," or "Gulliver's Travels," or the "Adventures of Baron Munchausen." "Startling, if true!" Are these statements true? The gentleman refers to the report of the minority of the Committee on Elections in the case of Boynton vs. Loring. Now, with the permission of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WEAVER,] the author of that report, who sits before me, I want to examine the foundation for this statement of the gentleman from New York; and I do it with the more pleasure because I know that no gentleman in this House will more readily than the gentleman from Iowa rise when he finds it necessary to make a correction in justice to the good old State of Massachusetts. He will allow me to say that in this report, signed with his own name, I find more misstatements, more absurdities, more want of information of the facts in regard to the voting power in the State of Massachusetts, than it would seem possible for anybody to put into a report. That is a pretty strong statement to make, as a gentleman near me suggests; but I make it advisedly. I want to say, however, that I do not hold the gentleman from Iowa responsible for these statements, because I find they are copied, line for line and word for word, from the brief of the counsel for the contestant.

Mr. WEAVER. And the report so states.

Mr. ROBINSON. The gentleman says that he so stated in the report, and so he did, adding that he made them his own. I do not, as I said, hold him responsible; but I go further back to the fountain-head of all these statements. I am surprised that any gentleman living in Massachusetts would make these statements and overpersuade my learned and vigilant friend from Iowa to adopt them.

I read from that report. After giving the provision of the constitution prescribing the educational qualification for suffrage, the report proceeds:

Under it the most learned professors of Europe coming here and taking upon themselves the duties and privileges of citizens could not vote unless they were able to read English.

The trouble is not about learned professors. Everybody knows that a learned professor coming from abroad is not naturalized until after five years' residence; and my observation is that the learned professor understands the English language by that time.

Then I read on:

It attracted no attention and has not been enforced by statute until since 1874, when the dominant party in Massachusetts began to fear for their majority.

It was adopted in 1857. It was enacted into a law to enforce it in 1860, and has been in every volume of the statutes, on every lawyer's table, in every town-clerk's law library, and in many private citizens' hands by thousands, this same law unchanged, and every select-man of every town and every election officer of the State has had it placed before him by special instruction of the State department to observe it in judging the qualification of voters in that State at each election.

Not brought under attention until 1874! Well, let us see. That is the statement made by the learned counsel for the contestant. So says my friend from Iowa.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Who was that?

Mr. ROBINSON. It is stated here a gentleman by the name of Butler. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. A distinguished citizen of your State.

Mr. REED. The late democratic candidate for Senator. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON. I propose to show this matter was understood before 1874. Turn to the debates in the Congressional Globe, volume 75, and in 1869 in this House, and within these walls, General Benjamin F. Butler made this speech in reply to an inquiry made by the gentleman from New York, the chairman of this Census Committee. He says:

Everybody in Massachusetts can vote irrespective of color who can read and write.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. When was that?

Mr. ROBINSON. Eighteen hundred and sixty-nine.

The qualification is equal in its justice, and an ignorant white man cannot vote there and a learned negro be excluded; but in the Georgia Legislature there was a white man who could hardly read and write, if at all, voted in because he was white, while a negro who spoke and read two languages was voted out solely because he was black. It is well that Massachusetts requires her citizens should read and write before being permitted to vote. Almost everybody votes there under that rule, certainly every native-born person of proper age and sex votes there, and there are hundreds and thousands in this country who would thank God continually on their bended knees if it could be provided that voters in the city of New York should be required to read and write. They would then believe republican government in form and fact far more safe than now.

That speech was delivered, so says the Globe, by the same gentleman who was the counsel of the contestant, and who said in that argument it had never attracted attention until 1874. That speech was made in 1869 in this House.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Will the gentleman permit me a question now?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. The argument you are making, as I understand it, is to prove the author of the speech is unworthy of belief, is it not?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly not. I make no such comment at all, and I hope the gentleman will not.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. You are contradicting his brief.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am merely showing the gentleman from New York was quite wise in saying these figures are startling if true. They should have printed the word "if true" in capitals.

Now I will read on:

Now, the population of Massachusetts in 1870 was 1,457,352 by the United States census. The whole population by the census of 1875 was 1,651,652, making an increase of 194,300, or 13.33 percentage of gain.

Then the gentleman goes on further:

Assuming that the percentage of increase of the population from May, 1875, to November 1878, was the same as it was from 1870 to 1875, (in the proportion of the lengths of the two periods of time covered by these dates,) although in fact the gain would be considerably greater.

Now, there is a statement of fact. "Although it would be considerably greater." Let us see about that. The census of 1880 makes the population of the State of Massachusetts 1,783,012. Then from 1870 to 1875 she gained 194,300; from 1875 to 1880 she gained 131,360. So in the whole of the second five years of the decade she did not gain as much as the gentleman says in fact she gained in the first three years and six months.

Well, let that pass. Going down on the same page of the report I find two tables, which I wish gentlemen would take home and read. "May, 1875, table," showing the whole number of illiterates, voters, &c., taken from census tables of the census of the State of Massachusetts. Then we have an assumed table for 1878. On the calculation which has been made you will see how uncertain this must be. I take them as they are given. Let us see what the result is. Take first the statement as the gentleman himself gives it. He says there are 490,150 ratable polls of voters in the Commonwealth who pay poll-tax. That is in 1878, according to his calculation. Now, he says:

Applying the same percentage to the illiterate native-born, aliens, paupers, convicts, idiotic, and insane, we should deduct from said ratable polls 113,657, leaving 376,501 ratable polls November, 1878. Allowing 4 per cent. for stay-at-homes, 15,060, leaves 361,441, of whom but 256,332, being but 67 per cent., voted, one-third of the voting population being disfranchised.

Now, there is a very pregnant suggestion. "Allowing 4 per cent. for stay-at-homes!" How did he get that? I do not think there has been an election in the State of Massachusetts when in almost every town and city there has not been from 10 to 25 per cent. who have staid at home, men who had the right to vote, and they do it constantly. Why, in my own town, the town in which I live, at the election of last November in that contest for the election of national and State officers and for representation in Congress, that town in which both of the candidates for Congress resided, with its 1,429 voters, about one-sixth of them did not vote at all; and so it is all over the State. Now, the gentleman in his report says 256,332 persons voted in 1878. So they did. But he goes on to say that all of the rest were disfranchised. Now, I look at his own list of figures contained in that report and I find that he declares the number of voters native-born and naturalized are 382,713. Is that much of a disfranchisement? He says there should be 376,501 that ought to vote according to the provisions of the fourteenth amendment and to his own figures, for I give his own arithmetic, and I turn back to the preceding page and he shows that there were in 1878 382,713 voters, from which he deduces the remarkable calculation that 136,859 were disfranchised, when he just asserted on the same page that—and I ask gentlemen to notice it—he says 105,009 are disfranchised. Then he goes on in his eloquent speech, and he says, "What we demand is that Massachusetts shall take her foot off the Constitution and off the necks of 105,000 disfranchised citizens of that Commonwealth." That of course is very eloquent, but ought he not also to have asked that she shall take her foot off the necks of the other thirty thousand which he says, according to his own figures, are disfranchised?

I take only his own statement of it. Take the ratable polls assumed, and here you will observe that every male person above twenty years, not twenty-one, pays a poll tax, and his figures are 490,158. Deduct from this the number of voters, 382,713, because all of those that you have on that list of voters can vote. There is no trouble in reference to their right to vote. They are on the list, and of course no man on that list is deprived of his right. What does the gentleman mean, then, when he says that 382,713 of these are on the voting list out of 490,158, and then goes on to state that there are 136,000 disfranchised? Why, according to his own figures, there will be only 107,445 to be accounted for.

He says that there are 86,258 aliens not citizens of the United States. This number, of course, must be taken from the 107,445, the remainder just found. And so we take them out. That would leave, according to his own statement or the figures that he has given us, only 21,187. Then take out from this the paupers, those persons who are in almshouses and supported at the expense of the community, the convicts who are in the prisons and are not allowed to vote, and the idiots and insane, (persons who do not vote,) and you will have 9,271 persons more to take from his list, which reduces it still further to 11,916. Then you deduct from this the number of persons who are above twenty and under twenty-one who do not vote, which he says amounts to 6,212, and his great aggregate of disfranchised persons is reduced down to 5,704 persons.

But, Mr. Speaker, a great many of these persons may have changed their residence. They may have moved from one district into another and not resided therein for a length of time which would entitle them to vote, and it is safe to assume that a considerable number of them have not voted. We know, for the facts seem to be clearly ascertained, that about 25 per cent. do not care to take the trouble of going to vote. We know that large numbers of them do not care to take the trouble of registering. It is fair to presume that when so many will not take the trouble to vote, many will not register. Probably some of them have not paid their poll-tax, so that the vast number of disfranchised is considerably reduced beyond even the small figures which we have succeeded, according to his own calculations, in reducing them to. Taking out, then, all these possible errors and allowing for all of these things, it leaves but a very small showing indeed for his claim of disfranchised.

That is all there is of it. Why should it not be so. For twenty-three years it has been written before the people of that State that to entitle them to vote and hold office they shall first learn to read and write. Near to every man's dwelling stands a public free school. Education is brought to the door of every man. These school-houses are supported with almost unbounded munificence. Children have been born in that time and have attended school at the public expense, and the general education of the people has been advanced. And that residuum of the people who all the time are not able to read and write is constantly diminishing and disappearing; so that now the exception is to find one who does not read or write.

I state that I know, and I know very well the people of that State. I know the native portion and the naturalized and the aliens. And I say here that many a man who has come into that State an alien and has sought to be naturalized and become a citizen and a voter there, has at once proceeded to educate himself, and has learned to read and to write and has qualified himself as a voter in that Commonwealth. There are hundreds of such cases. It is not that the education is shared by the native-born alone. No; its blessings have gone over all without regard to the place of their nativity.

I will not take any time in talking about the policy of the law. There are some and many people in the State who do not think it wise to require the prepayment of a poll tax. People differ about that. Some time or other that may be changed; but for sixty years it has been the law, and it so remains. Looking into the constitution and the laws of the sister States of Virginia and Georgia and Delaware and Pennsylvania we find similar provisions of the same antiquity justified by the communities that have adopted such legislation. And we say to all the States we leave to you those questions of policy, and we commend them to your judgment and careful consideration. Does any one claim that representation should be reduced because of insanity or idiocy, or because of convicts? Does any one claim that all laws requiring residence and registration should be done away? And yet they are on the same line, on the same principle. There is not one of these prerequisites on which I have commented that it is not in the power of the person who desires to get suffrage to overcome and control and conquer so that he may become a voter. But if he be a black man he cannot put off his color. He cannot, if he were born a member of a particular race, strip himself of that quality; nor can he, if he has been in servitude; nor can he if he has been in rebellion, take out that taint; nor can he, if he has been convicted of other crimes, remove his record of criminality. These are an inherent, inseparable, indissoluble part of that man. But his education, his registration, his residence, his payment of a portion of the burdens of the State and the other matters are in his power and his control. I find it to be in accord with the wisdom of the people of the country that it is the true policy to let the States govern those matters for themselves. The Constitution of the United States touches those things that are out of the man's control. I am very grateful indeed to the House for its attention.

Mr. WEAVER rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] has been recognized, and is entitled to the floor for one hour.

Mr. WEAVER. I ask the gentleman from Mississippi to yield to me a short time.

Mr. HOOKER. I would like to yield to the gentleman if in my power, but all the time at my disposal which I am not to occupy I have already given away. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. CHALMERS.]

Mr. CHALMERS. I am glad this discussion has risen to the high plane of statesmanship which has been exhibited in the two speeches of this morning on the other side of the House. I was afraid from the declarations and threats made by some of the gentlemen on that side, when this subject was last under discussion, that unless they could have such an apportionment as suited themselves they would treat us to all that parliamentary tactics would enable them to do in the way of obstruction; in other words, that they would filibuster against any apportionment. I was afraid that those States which are now entitled to an increase of representation would be made to wait beyond the necessary time by reason of such tactics upon the part of these gentlemen. I was in hopes, however, that gentlemen on that side would remember that in the next House of Representatives the difference between parties would be less than it is now; and if filibustering now is justifiable to prevent the majority from passing a bill in accordance with its own views of right and justice, filibustering might become necessary in the estimation of the minority in the next House, and so those States which are entitled to increased representation would be greatly postponed if not entirely debarred of their rights. I repeat, then, that I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] and the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] who have spoken this morning, for having stepped from the low platform of party politics to the loftier plane of statesmanship and patriotism.

In the few minutes allowed me I want to call the attention of gentlemen to the very strange position occupied by those who propose to postpone the passage of an apportionment bill till they could ascertain by investigating committees or otherwise whether any voters in the United States have been deprived of the right of suffrage by fraud, intimidation, or violence.

Gentlemen assert that these things have been done. They ask that committees be sent out to investigate the fact and report it if true. Then they tell us they propose to reduce the representation of such States. I say, then, that gentlemen who propose to do this propose to do something that will be in direct violation of the fifteenth amendment of the Constitution. They propose, in other words, indirectly, under pretense of following the fourteenth amendment, to disfranchise the negro race in the South by a law of Congress in violation of the fifteenth amendment.

It was said by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] that the fourteenth amendment was only intended to confer the right of suffrage on the colored race. Upon this I take issue with him, and to this I shall reply if I have time. But now I desire to say if this is true, then the fourteenth amendment was superseded, if not repealed, by the fifteenth.

The fourteenth amendment, as he admitted, recognized the right of a State to exclude negroes from voting, and gave to Congress the power to reduce the representation of any State which denied to the negro the right to vote in the proportion that the number of voters so excluded bore to the whole number of males over twenty-one years of age in the State.

But the fifteenth amendment took away from the State the right to exclude negroes as such from voting, and the power of exclusion being taken away, the power to reduce representation on account of such exclusion was necessarily taken away.

Hence the fifteenth amendment has rendered useless, if it has not repealed, the fourteenth entirely. Under my construction it has repealed the fourteenth so far as any power was given to Congress to reduce the representation of a State for any abridgment of negro suffrage; for the right of the State to make such abridgment is taken away, and any such act of a State is absolutely null and void. But the reduction of representation may still be made when any State denies or in any way abridges the right of a white man to vote, or even of a negro, if not on account of race or color.

But under the construction given to the fourteenth amendment by the gentleman from Massachusetts, it is entirely repealed by the fifteenth.

If any State, then, by any means, by law, by force, or by fraud, has disfranchised any portion of the negro race as such, and that fact is ascertained by the report of your committee to Congress, what do you propose to do? Why you simply propose to legalize it. You ascertain that negroes have been prevented from voting by bulldozing, and you simply say to those people, "Go on with your bulldozing as much as you please, provided you allow us to cut down your representation." This is the only meaning of the argument the gentlemen make when they say the representation must be reduced in those States where negroes are prevented from voting by intimidation, violence, and fraud. They propose to acquiesce in the fraud and legalize the disfranchisement.

Mr. LOWE. Will the gentleman from Mississippi allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CHALMERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOWE. I wish to ask the gentleman if he would regard the punishment of violence and bulldozing by Congress as legalizing that offense?

Mr. CHALMERS. Yes, sir; it would in fact be a recognition that these voters were excluded rightfully under the fourteenth amendment if you apply the remedy provided in that amendment of a reduction of representation. I maintain that this is no time for such an investigation. It has nothing to do with the question of apportionment. If Congress has any power to prevent this thing, it should be done at another time and in another way. But we should not delay the apportionment bill in order to investigate something which has nothing whatever to do with the question of apportionment. That point was so clearly made by the gentleman from Massachusetts who last spoke that I am relieved of any argument upon it. He showed clearly that the apportionment even under the fourteenth amendment must be made upon numbers, and upon numbers alone.

After the apportionment is made, if any State shall be found to have violated the provisions of that fourteenth amendment, that State is to be reduced in its representation in proportion to the number of its citizens so excluded from voting. But we are not to stop here in fixing the apportionment to ascertain these facts. They are to be ascertained afterward if necessary.

I propose now to differ a little from the gentleman from Massachusetts in regard to the history of this fourteenth amendment. After the thirteenth amendment had set free the slaves of this country, then according to the old Constitution every State was entitled to be represented in Congress according to the whole number of its inhabitants excluding only Indians not taxed. This would have given an increased representation to the former slave States, but the whites in these States would alone have been entitled to vote, as the whites in Northern States did where there were free negroes, and as the whites in California now do where there are Chinamen.

The fourteenth amendment was then devised and adopted, but I differ with the gentleman from Massachusetts as to its object. It was, in my judgment, intended not to confer suffrage on the negroes, but to cut off the power of the southern whites. But in framing that amendment they made it broader perhaps than its authors intended. They said in plain language that no State should be entitled to enumeration for representation for any males over twenty-one years of age whose right to vote was denied or in any manner abridged. This clause is now coming home to gentlemen to trouble them; according to the old Spanish proverb, "their chickens are coming home to roost."

As I have said, the fifteenth amendment has settled the whole question as to the negro race; they can no longer be excluded on account of race from suffrage by State authority. Now, gentlemen must remember that the white race are also citizens, and if their right to vote is denied or in any manner abridged by any State for any cause save crime or rebellion, the language of that amendment stares them in the face and says that such State must suffer a reduction of its representation in proportion to the number of citizens so excluded. It will not do now to attempt to refine away that portion of the Constitution. It seems to be applied, and should be applied to white men excluded in Northern States, as was shown by the report made by the Census Bureau to the Congress that made the last apportionment——

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a joint resolution of the following title:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 337) authorizing and requesting the President to extend to the Government and people of France an invitation to join the Government and people of the United States in the observance of the centennial anniversary of the surrender of Lord Cornwallis at Yorktown, Virginia.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATION.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill making an apportionment under the tenth census.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] is entitled to the floor for forty minutes.

Mr. HOOKER addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Speaker, no apportionment bill which is not fair, just, and right ought to be presented to this House, much less passed, and no one that is unjust or inequitable can pass. The time has gone by when any one section of this country will submit to the domination of another. We, as Representatives, are all equal. Whether from the East, West, North, or South, whether our credentials bear the imprimatur of a State whose star makes up the southern cross or the northern constellation, no Representative overpeers his fellow in this national council, and this without reference to where he was born or what his color is.

Now, if this bill is right and just and proper it ought to pass without unnecessary delay or factious opposition. If it is wrong, unequal, and unjust, it ought not to pass, and no fair minded man ought to hazard his reputation in advancing a bill of such a character. Legislation of this character is purely political. Apportionment bills, whether brought forward in the Legislatures of the States or the national council are purely political in character. They go to the maintenance of power in certain integral parts which make up the State or nation. If there were no State lines it would be a very easy matter to apportion representation according to numbers, but when you have these ugly fractions which remain over after full numbers are ascertained, it becomes a difficult task to frame an apportionment bill that will be at the same time just and equal to all.

I will quote a sentence here from the very able speech of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SHERWIN,] which I assert has not been controverted by any gentleman who advocates a lower ratio as a basis of representation than that advocated by him. I say, therefore, the statement he made must be taken as confessed and true. What is that statement? I have it here, and I will read it in the presence of the House:

> Upon the basis of three hundred and one the certainly democratic States have a gain of six and the other States a gain of two. Upon a basis of three hundred and eleven the democratic States have a net gain of twelve and the other States have a net gain of six. On a basis of three hundred and nineteen the certainly democratic States have a net gain of thirteen and the other States have a net gain of thirteen.

Now, if you will read that to any fair-minded man and ask him which of these ratios are right, he would not hesitate long to decide in favor of the basis of three hundred and nineteen.

Taking into consideration the slight difference that exists between three hundred and eleven and three hundred and nineteen members, opposition to the latter number cannot securely rest on a discrepancy so slight. There must be some lurking advantage in the mystic number three hundred and eleven that is not found in three hundred and nineteen, else compromise on the one basis could be as easily reached in the one case as the other. The difference between the two numbers is too small to justify vigorous opposition if the advantages growing out of either were equal.

A House of three hundred and nineteen members would not be any more turbulent or unwieldy than a House of three hundred and eleven members, and all of you know it, every one of you.

Now, if any gentleman, I do not care with what party regalia he is now or in the past might have been clothed, whether he were a democrat, a republican, or a greenbacker, had suggested to me a month ago that the democratic party of the North would have allowed such a thing I would have said no. I would have said I know that the democratic party has always been cringing the knee at the behest of the South. They made the compromise of 1820, and afterward, when the South demanded that it should be repealed, repealed it. When the South demanded that they should be allowed to take their slaves into free territory a very large part of the democratic party of the North immediately uncovered itself in the presence of its southern masters and said "yes;" and so it was and has been all along down for fifty years. But in this era and in this day if you had told me that the democratic party of the North would have said to the democrats of the South, "We will consent that our people shall be cut off and that these fractions shall be allowed to inure to your exclusive advantage," I would have said that they would do nothing of the kind. But I am now convinced to the contrary.

It is the old story over again. The South demand the basis of three hundred and eleven. I do not blame you for demanding it, as power always seeks to enlarge its volume. Of course, if you can get power, keep it. There never was a petty tyrant intoxicated by the glamour of the scepter that did not when his power was assaulted struggle for its continuance. There never was a political party in power who did not fight with equal vigor to maintain it.

But what would you gentlemen think of us at the North if we should sit here silently and allow you to fasten these shackles upon our people? You would have a right to spurn us with contempt, to vomit us out of your mouths, if we consented to any such thing. But we will never consent to it. If you want a fair and just apportionment bill, you can have it; but on no other condition.

I incline to the belief that the number of Representatives in this body ought to be curtailed rather than enlarged. As stated by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] a few moments ago, we have thirty-eight legislative bodies in the United States. This body does not legislate upon all subjects; many matters are left entirely to the Legislatures of the various States. But even if this were not so, we have quite enough members for legislative purposes. I incline to the opinion that wise statesmanship, far-seeing wisdom, looking to the wants of the country, would decrease the number of Representatives rather than increase it. If I should decrease it, I would go to the point where the decrease would reach the same equitable basis that the increase does in the bill proposed by the minority of the committee. But that is not very material. Three hundred and nineteen is not a very large body as compared with the present, and such a number has the advantage of securing justice to all the States.

Mr. COX. Would the gentleman like to fix this increase on the basis of population only?

Mr. CALKINS. I am coming to that in a moment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman fixes it on the basis of population, he has not rightly given the gain of the South on the numbers proposed by me.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] be extended, as a similar courtesy has been accorded to other gentlemen.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I must object, unless the time be limited.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. How much more time does the gentleman from Indiana desire?

Mr. CALKINS. Fifteen minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the gentleman proceeding for fifteen minutes longer.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Speaker, I was considering some of the objections made to a large House, and was speaking with reference to what I thought would be beneficial to the country, decreasing rather than increasing this body. On this point I will take the liberty of printing what I do not wish to detain the House in saying.

My own view of the number of Representatives in this House is that it ought not to exceed two hundred and fifty. As it is now composed it is simply one vast body of committees. All subjects which can be grouped together under a common head are sent to committees consisting of from seven to fifteen members. They alone have time to investigate and consider the facts surrounding the bills committed to them. The residue of the House have not only no time to investigate the subjects but can receive only a hasty and imperfect idea from the discussion allowed to the members of such committees. This certainly cannot be said to be considerate and deliberate legislation. In the very nature of things legislation thus adopted must be hasty and crude.

In the next place, larger constituencies will tend to give us able men in this body, and add dignity and gravity to its proceedings. On the other hand, it is urged that a large body is less likely to be corrupted, and by its turbulence and unwieldy character will act as a check on legislation; that it must always act through its committees and can never be properly styled a deliberative body in the sense of cool deliberation and dignified equanimity. However this may be,

I am still of the opinion a number not in excess of two hundred and fifty would approach nearer to a model legislative body than to increase it beyond that number. It certainly would not be as turbulent and unwieldy as it now is, and the bustle, noise, and confusion which now exists would be largely decreased, members would be able to hear what is taking place in their presence, and render such assistance in current legislation as is expected at the hands of all Representatives.

I come now, Mr. Speaker, to examine another question which has been much discussed during this debate—the construction of the fourteenth article of the amendments to the Constitution. I do not care to confine myself to the narrow limits within which, as I thought, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] restricted himself in discussing this question. He spoke of the purposes of the fourteenth amendment; so did the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.] But, Mr. Speaker, the general principle on which that amendment was bottomed and upon which it stands was not adverted to by either of them. What is it? It was intended to overturn and tear up by the roots that doctrine which was promulgated in the Dred Scott decision by Chief-Justice Taney; it was to declare a national citizenship; that was the object of the amendment. I do not care what may have been the narrow, the selfish, or the grand purposes of any party, that was what the amendment did; it established a national citizenship, and made it as broad as the nation. The purpose was to declare that every man, native-born or naturalized, whether among the pine trees of Maine or on the golden shores of the Pacific, whether residing among the frozen lakes of the Northwest or among the orange blossoms of Florida, was a citizen, clothed in the panoply of American citizenship.

A MEMBER. It established "manhood suffrage."

Mr. CALKINS. Yes; the fourteenth amendment had for its main object the establishment of "manhood suffrage." However lawyers may quibble or within whatsoever narrow limits try to confine it, this is the broad principle that must forever obtain in construing it. I do not care whether it is the State of Massachusetts or Rhode Island that says a man shall not vote unless he owns a certain amount of property, or whether it is the State of Mississippi or Louisiana that by a general system of fraud and intimidation prevents voters from voting, each of these communities ought to be curtailed in their representation as a punishment for curtailing this manhood suffrage. [Applause.]

On this subject I read from a speech delivered in this House by General Garfield on the 6th day of September, 1871, during the debate on the apportionment bill under the census of 1870:

> In the State of Massachusetts people are deprived of suffrage on account of inability to read and write. All such persons, under the constitutional amendments which I have indicated, must be subtracted from the total population of Massachusetts before we can know what is her representative population. If in the Southern States men are still denied the right to vote in consequence of race or color or for lack of property qualification, their total must be reduced accordingly. I do not know how large the sum to be subtracted is in any State. I am aware that the facts were very difficult to ascertain, and perhaps the result may not change the number of Representatives in any State; but it is clear that we ought to have all the facts before we proceed to fix the relative number of Representatives of the States.

Upon this same question, Judge Shellabarger, of Ohio, on the 12th day of December, speaking of the fourteenth amendment, said:

> Now I say it was the design of this constitutional amendment, and it was a beneficent one, that wherever a State may choose to do that thing—and the State may do it—the fourteenth amendment does not take away the power of the State to do it. You in Massachusetts may establish your qualification of intelligence, or you in New York and Rhode Island may establish your property qualifications as you may please, but you take the consequences in their effect upon your power in this House; you have your choice. The design of this constitutional amendment was that the poor man, the ignorant man, the colored man, should be secured, should be guaranteed his right to vote; that the States should not deprive him of his right of representation except by taking the consequences of not having in this Hall representation for those of his class.

I now read an extract from the able brief of counsel in the Slaughter-house cases, reported in 16 Wallace, at page 51 et seq. The argument is sound and the logic unanswerable. Speaking of the fourteenth amendment, it is said:

> That amendment was a development of the thirteenth and is a more comprehensive exposition of the principles which lie at the foundation of the thirteenth.
> Slavery had been abolished as the issue of the civil war. More than three millions of a population lately servile were liberated without preparation for any political or civil duty. Besides this population of emancipated slaves there was a large and growing population who came to this country without education in the laws and Constitution of the country, and who had begun to exert a perceptible influence over our Government. There were also a large number of unsettled and difficult questions of State and national right that had no other settlement or solution but what the war had afforded. It had been maintained from the origin of the Constitution, by one political party, men of a high order of ability and who exerted a great influence, that the State was the highest political organization in the United States; that through the consent of the separate States the Union had been formed for limited purposes; that there was no social union except by and through the States, and that in extreme cases the several States might cancel the obligations to the Federal Government and reclaim the allegiance and fidelity of its members. Such were the doctrines of Mr. Calhoun and of others, both those who preceded and those who have followed him. It is nowhere declared in the Constitution what "a citizen" is or what constitutes citizenship; and what ideas were entertained of citizenship by one class of our country may be seen in the South Carolina case of Hunt vs. The State, where Harper, J., referring to the arguments of Messrs. Pettigru, Blanding, McWillie, and Williams, men eminent in the South as jurists, who were opposing nullification, says:
> "It has been admitted in argument by all the counsel except one that in case of secession by the State from the Union the citizens and constituted authorities would be bound to obey and give effect to the act."
> But the fourteenth amendment does define citizenship and the relations of citizens to the State and Federal Government. It ordains that "all persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the State where they reside." Citizenship in a State is made by residence and without reference to the consent of the State. Yet by the same amendment where it exists no State can abridge its privileges or immunities. The doctrine of the State-rights party, led in modern times by Mr. Calhoun, was that there was no citizenship in the whole United States except sub modo and by the permission of the States. According to their theory the United States had no integral existence except as an incomplete combination among several integers. The fourteenth amendment struck at and forever destroyed all such doctrines. It seems to have been made under an apprehension of a destructive faculty in the State governments. It consolidated the several integers into a consistent whole.
> By it the national principle has received an indefinite enlargement. The tie between the United States and every citizen in every part of its own jurisdiction has been made intimate and familiar. To the same extent the confederate features of the Government have been obliterated. The States, in their closest connection with the members of the State, have been placed under the oversight and restraining and enforcing hand of Congress. The purpose is manifest to establish through the whole jurisdiction of the United States one people, and that every member of the empire shall understand and appreciate the fact that his privileges and immunities cannot be abridged by State authority; that the State laws must be so framed as to secure life, liberty, property from arbitrary violation, and secure protection of law to all.
> Under it the fact of citizenship does not depend upon parentage, family, nor upon the historical division of the land into separate States, some of whom had a glorious history, of which its members were justly proud. Citizenship is assigned to nativity in any portion of the United States, and every person so born is a citizen.

These extracts bear me out largely in the view which I have taken and expressed relative to the construction of the fourteenth amendment. This amendment did more than to simply establish national citizenship. It opened the mouths of witnesses theretofore dumb in the presence of courts of justice. It forced unwilling and prejudiced ears to hear the simple story of injustice from the lips of the oppressed, and bade them relate their wrongs in the presence of the blinded goddess. It opened up a path to the governing potency of universal manhood suffrage. It gave all an equal chance in the race of life. It held out the glorious inducement to all men to become the peer of every other man. It is a fitting supplement to Magna Charta and the bill of rights found in the original Declaration of Independence, and I thank God that it is an emanation from the brain of the republican party, who wrote it down indelibly in the organic law of the land.

DEPRIVATION OF SUFFRAGE.

There is a distinction in law between the deprivation of suffrage and a reasonable regulation protecting the ballot-box—between disfranchisement and the prescribing of a qualification for voters. All laws which look to the protection of the ballot-box by prescribing qualifications of age, residence, and the like, are reasonable regulations thrown around the ballot-box to protect its purity; but all laws which add additional tests to a citizen's qualification to vote are in derogation of this great fundamental right upon which our governmental fabric rests. Laws must be construed liberally when they affect the rights of the people, and strictly when they are in derogation of those rights.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe we ought to pass an apportionment bill this session at all. I said on the stump (and I would be an arrant coward if I did not say the same thing here in the presence of the representatives of 50,000,000 people) that I am not satisfied the last census is correct. Take for example the State of South Carolina; I select it only by way of illustration. The population of South Carolina as returned by this census is 995,622. In 1870 it was 705,606, making an increase in round numbers of 290,000.

Now, it is said that the census of 1870 was not correct. Well, test the matter by the four preceding censuses. South Carolina was then as jealous of her power as any other State in the Union; yet if we take the average increase of the four censuses preceding 1870 it is but 48,000 in round numbers.

Give to South Carolina the 50,000 she was deprived of in 1870 and it makes 755,000. Give to her, then, the increase she would have between that time and this, and still it would not much exceed 800,000. She has 190,000 more people by these returns than the figures show she should have by applying this test.

Mr. COX. Which return does the gentleman read from? There have been three returns. The two last confirmed the first, and they are by republican officials.

Mr. CALKINS. The gentleman knows I cannot yield to him, as I have not time.

Mr. TILLMAN. But your time has been extended, and why not yield for a correction?

Mr. CAKLINS. I have only fifteen minutes, otherwise I would be glad to yield.

Mr. EVINS. I do not wish the gentleman to misrepresent the facts, and we will give him all the time he wants if he will yield so that corrections can be made.

Mr. COX. The men who complain took the last censuses, and those two last returns confirm the former one.

Mr. CALKINS. I am not challenging the census of South Carolina, except to say that the people of the North are not satisfied with it.

Mr. COX. Have you read the last two returns?

Mr. CALKINS. Yes; I have looked over them.

Mr. COX. The last two, I mean.

Mr. CALKINS. I do not know what you mean.

Mr. COX. There have been two made which confirm the first one.

Mr. CALKINS. I have the one here in this pamphlet.

Mr. COX. Then you are not fitted to speak on the subject. [Laughter.]

Mr. CALKINS. If I have not looked at the right return, and have misstated it, I want the gentleman to correct me now. Let me say I was using this merely by way of illustration. I say now no State can afford to ask an apportionment founded on any census which is not satisfactory to the great body of the people of the other States. They cannot afford it. This is one reason why I am not in favor of an apportionment bill at this session of Congress.

But to pass from that. Another reason is, that I am not satisfied with reference to the representation under the fourteenth amendment. I say when the law was passed by which the census was taken it ought to have provided some means by which we could have ascertained the facts as provided under the fourteenth amendment. This it omitted to do. It is nothing more than right it should have been done.

Now I come to another proposition in answer to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] whom I regret not to see in his seat. It is in answer to what he said the other day that the South was under the domination of troops for ten years after the war. I desire to call attention to a great fact which these gentlemen all seem to have overlooked. There are two periods of war; one is during the period of awful conflict, while contending armies are hurling thunderbolts of death and destruction at each other, and then comes another period between complete restoration of peace and the war period. That was the condition of the South for many years after the war closed. I have carefully looked up this question of the domination of troops complained of, and during no time after 1868 was there half a soldier on the average to a precinct in the whole Southern States; and to say that this number of soldiers overawed and put in fear these men whom I met on the battle-field is to say that which I know is not true. We know the power of each other; these troops never overawed these men; never, sir.

During that time troops were stationed there to prevent outbreaks. I have no doubt, sir, in certain instances the power of the troops in the way they were used was carried to an extreme. That was natural. But I defend the acts in a general way of the troops in the South. But I am glad to announce now that I believe the time is passed when there should be any further use of troops there.

Now, as to carpet-baggers. What is a carpet-bagger? In the strict sense of the term, I am a carpet-bagger in the State where I now live. I was born in Ohio. [Laughter.] Yes, some men are born lucky, and some rich, and some in Ohio. I was one of those who were born in Ohio. I believed when the war closed I had conquered the right to go anywhere I wanted to in America, and live there and breathe the free air and say what I chose, so I did not trangress the law. I believe it yet.

There is no such thing as aliens to the territory within States if a man is a citizen of the United States. There is no such thing as alien to the soil in any State in the Union if a man is an American citizen. No matter where he goes, wherever the flag floats every citizen is entitled to all the rights any other man has, be he imported or to the manor born.

It is said that these men in the South called carpet-baggers plundered and stole and all that. All I have to say, if this be true, is that the white people of the South were responsible and nobody else. Why, Mr. Speaker, although they talk of the proscription of the republican party, I challenge to-day a parallel where in history any government ever extended such terms to a fallen foe as the republican party extended to the people of the South. It was one line of grand and magnificent magnanimity. Gentlemen from the South who stand here are themselves monuments of that fact. Not a single one of them was ever tried for the overt act of treason which they committed. I am glad of it; and I am glad in this nineteenth century all these crimes were wiped out by the men to whom they surrendered and they were clothed again in the panoply of citizenship, although to-day they are acting solidly against us. This fact I deplore. I do say from my heart that I am sorry this section is still arrayed solidly against that party.

You say that we talk about the bloody shirt. Why, gentlemen, if only twenty of your number on that side of the House would step across the line and come over here you could stop it forever. You know this to be true; you keep it alive and when we refer to it you complain. And yet you stand there solidly, stand there as a menace to what we believe is the true doctrine of governmental policy. [An interruption.] Oh, no! I do not call you traitors now. I do say you committed treason in making war on the United States Government; but now by our act you are reclothed and rehabilitated in the royal purple of full citizenship. All political crimes have been freely and ungrudgingly wiped out. And each of you is the equal of any other citizen in the whole land. And to every brave man in the South I say I will meet you half way, ay, more than half way, to help bind up forever the gaping wounds of the war. I will rejoice with "exceeding great joy" when we can meet on all questions, looking alone to the good of all irrespective of the past. I say further, to all of the soldiers of the South, with a heartiness equaled only by the Scottish chief, you are welcome back—

> Come, share
> A soldier's bed, a soldier's fare.

More can you ask? More do you require? All I ask is that you shall remain peaceable citizens of this great and good and magnificent Government.

Mr. Speaker, I had intended to discuss some questions more or less abstruse, some of which have been somewhat entered upon by those who have preceded me, but the time allotted is too short. I see the moment is fast approaching when the inexorable gavel of the Speaker will give its significant announcement of the expiration of my time. I must hasten on, leaving these questions for another occasion.

I see before me the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LORING] and the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER.] These gentlemen are magnificent monuments and true types of the old Commonwealths which they in part represent. I do not blame them for the love and devotion which they continually show for these ancient States. Around and about them cluster memories of heroic deeds. Their history is familiar to all. The repetition of these glorious epochs never fall on unwilling ears. With them I glory in these grand old reminiscences and the characters whose lives furnish the warp and woof of our country's magnificent achievements. While you revel amid these past glories I claim for my section—the magnificent West—a share in all you say. It is true we have no such monuments as Bunker Hill, no hallowed spot like Yorktown, located on our soil to which we may point with ancestral pride. But while they happen to be located on your soil, are they not ours as well? Did not the Huguenot and the Cavalier, the Quaker from the city of Brotherly Love, and the Puritan furnish us our early settlers in the Far West? Ay, Mr. Speaker, it was the brave, adventurous men of those early colonies that pushed their way westward, far to the sunset side of the Alleghanies, where they erected their cabins amid the unbroken forests, subdued them into fertile fields, and made them gardens of beauty and happiness. Here they erected their first school-houses—temples of learning—and reared their children side by side. The Cavalier led to the altar the Puritan girl, and their childrens' veins were tinged with the blood of the early colonists from the rivulets flowing from close springs. Thus the hot blood of the Cavalier and the conscientious character of the Puritan intermingled and brought forth the splendid characteristics of the true Westerner.

Our code of laws was liberalized, and the good of diverse systems was extracted and compiled into enactments at once just, liberal, and generous. Habits formed in childhood were softened by contact with the hospitality which hardship produces. All these diverse circumstances served to melt down old ideas into a consistent and happy union, and to give to our western people that liberality, generosity, activity, and enterprise which characterizes them. Our homes are welcome to the stranger. Our hearthstones are models of domestic happiness. Our school-houses are temples of learning for all. The masses of our people are educated, and believe in religious and personal liberty. Our grand prairies and magnificent forests, our rich valleys and fertile plains, yearly furnish a mine of wealth unknown to other lands and unheard of in any other equal area of territory in the world.

While I am proud of my people and my section, while I love them to an extent equal to that felt by any member from any other section, I trust, Mr. Speaker, that I am not so narrow and selfish as to love it better than my whole country. This country, now reunited and bound by ties indissoluble, all of it, is "my own, my native land." [Applause.]

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, if it be the desire of gentlemen that this debate shall continue, I will go on; otherwise, I will yield to a motion to adjourn. [Cries of "No!" "No!" "Finish the discussion!"] Then I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. AIKEN.]

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask the gentleman from South Carolina if he will not yield for a motion to adjourn? [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. AIKEN. I have but few words to say, Mr. Speaker, and would like to have that privilege now. [Cries of "Go on!" "Go on!"]

After the admirable speeches made to-day by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] and the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ROBINSON,] I had hoped that this discussion might have been continued upon that plane of statesmanship which they had inaugurated, and that partisan prejudices would no more be heard in this debate. But my good friend from Indiana, [Mr. CALKINS,] whose attention I now invoke, has thought proper to present some very pertinent questions, which I propose directly to answer.

From the remarks of my friend, Mr. Speaker, and of some of those who preceded him on that side of the House, I am impressed that if there is any pharisaical righteousness on earth it is to be found in the republican party whenever questions pertaining to the South are discussed by them. To-day they seem to be solicitous whether or not a large proportion of the people of the South are permitted to vote, and the question is raised by them whether it is not the duty of Congress to appoint a committee of investigation upon this subject.

I ask my friend from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] and his colleagues why is this a latter-day thought with them? Why did they not desire to investigate this subject when republican rascality and extravagance were running riot over the South and none but republican votes were cast? I hold in my hand, sir, a Congressional Directory for 1874, of the first session of the Forty-third Congress, and in turning to my own State I find that J. H. Rainey received in the first district 19,765 votes as a republican, "being all the votes that were cast," as the Directory states. From the same source I learn that A. Y. Ransier was elected as a republican from another district, receiving 20,061 votes against 6,549 votes cast for W. Gurney, independent republican, not a single democratic vote being cast in the district. In the third district, which I have the honor to represent, R. B. Elliott, the candidate for the republican party, received 21,627 votes, while only 1,094 votes were cast for W. H. McCaw, democrat. One year later I find L. C. Carpenter, republican, was elected to fill an unexpired term, Elliott having resigned, and received 23,185 votes, as is recorded in the Directory, "there being no organized opposition."

Why is it, Mr. Speaker, that this party of great moral ideas, which then controlled the executive and legislative branches of our Government, did not think it incumbent upon them to have congressional investigation of this one-sided condition of things?

But let us come a little nearer to the present time. In the Directory of 1876 I find that at the election of 1874 E. W. M. Mackey, a republican, received 16,742 votes, and that C. W. Butts, also a republican, received at the same time 14,204 votes; no record to be found of a democratic vote being cast in the district. Is it not strange, Mr. Speaker, that this party whose representatives on this floor are so clamorous for fair and free elections did not consider it their duty to investigate at that time these anomalous elections?

But, sir, this same republican party, to-day so just, so fair, so moral, at that time so callous, so insensible to the rights of southern voters, are now demanding that all election districts shall be composed of contiguous counties. Sir, allow me to instance but a single case of republican gerrymandering during their revelry, extravagance, and prodigality in South Carolina. The third congressional district was composed of the counties of Abbeville, Anderson, Laurens, Newberry, Oconee, Pickens, and Richland, and no portion of Richland County is within perhaps fifteen miles of any point of either of the remaining counties which constitute the district, Lexington County, which has a democratic majority of about 1,000, intervening between Richland and Newberry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. AIKEN. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. I have not often wearied the attention of this House and do not desire to do so now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's proceeding? The Chair hears none.

Mr. AIKEN. My friend from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] says that as long ago as 1868 there were no more troops in South Carolina than would have allowed a half soldier to each one of the precincts.

Mr. CALKINS. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him, I wish to say that I spoke of the whole South.

Mr. AIKEN. I accept the correction, and acknowledge that his remark was true as applied to South Carolina. The gentleman must not misunderstand me as saying that it was the number of troops that overran South Carolina during the six years to which I have alluded, and during which time I have shown there were no democratic votes cast. We refrained from voting not because we were afraid of the military force present, but because we protested against that usurpation of power that authorized the presence of the military at the ballot-box. We believed then, as now, that we were again in the Union and had the right to cast a free ballot, which could not be done in the presence of the suzerainty of the bayonet. Sir, we were subserviently obedient to the Federal authorities. General Ruger was then in command in South Carolina, and had he hung up his old boots in the capitol and written above them "he who shall dare these boots displace, must meet the United States face to face," the order would have been implicitly obeyed by every citizen of the State and those old boots would have been as potent in executing the commands of the Government as ten times the number of soldiers as were then in the State. It was not the power, sir, but the presence of the bayonet that drove democratic voters from the polls during those six long years of anarchy and oppression. Sir, in 1873 I myself told a soldier at the polls, "I will not vote under duress; the Constitution entitles me to the privilege of voting as a freeman, and there is no freedom under that bayonet." For that reason, and for that reason alone, sir, I refrained from voting, and so did the democrats of the State.

But, Mr. Speaker, the republican party claim that the negroes of the South must of necessity vote the republican ticket. Possibly there was an ostensible reason for this thought some years ago; but to-day there exists potential causes for a reduction of the republican negro vote at every election. The intellectuality of the race is improving; the more thrifty of them are acquiring property and becoming tax-payers, and find a democratic incomparably less burdensome to the tax-payers than a republican government, and thousands of the more ignorant and timid have been rescued by their humane employers from the oppression of their Union leagues and other jesuitical organizations of their race. [Laughter and groans on the republican side.] Gentlemen may grunt and laugh sardonically at this remark, but it is literally true. I have myself accompanied colored men to the ballot-box who, with fear and trembling, asked and received protection while they voted the democratic ticket. You men of the North know nothing about the colored race in the South. You are ignorant of their manners, customs, traits of character, and their wants; and the gentleman from Michigan, a thousand miles away from any portion of the South, and of all men most ignorant of the people of that section, presuming to read us a lesson as to how we should deal with the colored man——

Many MEMBERS. Go on! Go on!

Mr. AIKEN. No, Mr. Speaker, I will not impose further upon the indulgence of the House, but will ask leave to print what I had intending saying at this time.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the time of the gentleman [Mr. CALKINS] from Indiana was extended for fifteen minutes. My own State is entitled to be heard, and the gentleman now on the floor ought to have an equal extension of time.

Mr. CALKINS. I hope the time of the gentleman will be extended.

Mr. KEIFER. There will be no objection.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to obtrude my remarks upon the House unless by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the time of the gentleman from South Carolina being extended? The Chair hears none.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. Speaker, if the threats and warnings elicited by the proceedings of this House from the stalwart portion of the republican party are to be credited, we may anticipate but few more free elections in the South. As a Southern farmer I have a greater interest in the welfare of the colored people of the South than all the gentlemen on that side of this Chamber, because upon them and their labor I and mine are, and always expect to be, dependent for our support. But, sir, identified from birth with the people of the South and actuated by the instincts of honesty and candor, I declare it as my conviction that further and continued congressional interference with our elections will result in arraying race against race to the detriment of the negro. For whatever fate may befall the South the white people of that section, prompted by the first law of nature, will never again quietly submit to negro domination. Eight long years' subjection to an oppression unknown to modern civilization is not to be forgotten in a generation. In South Carolina, and I believe a similar sentiment pervades the South, we desire to see the negro elevated. But, sir, a consummation of that desire will never be attained by a second degradation of the white man. You may draw your party lines upon color; we will meet you there and extinguish them. Our destiny is to live in the South with the negro, and we expect to work out that destiny peacefully, difficult as the problem may seem. But if political legislation denies us, or subverts our rights upon the presumption that we have in any wise curtailed the rights of the colored man, just then and there we will have reached that time in the South anticipated by the honorable gentleman from Michigan, when he expressed a fear lest civil liberty would be destroyed unless election results could be changed in that section. But if the American people will only repose confidence in the southern whites and grant them the opportunities circumstances present, I have little doubt but that this problem will be solved satisfactorily to both races, and ultimately result in the elevation of the negro and the continued and, I pray God, the everlasting political quiet between the two sections on his account.

A few more words, Mr. Speaker, and I have done. Allusion has been frequently made during this debate to the small republican vote throughout the South in the recent presidential election, and it has been reiterated that it could not be accounted for upon just grounds. For the first time since I have been a member of Congress have I heard the South censured and South Carolina escape more than the lion's share of the abuse. But it seems the recent vote in that State has given satisfaction to those who, for the purpose of this debate, have bewildered themselves with arithmetical calculations. Perhaps these gentlemen are not aware that during the last campaign South Carolina had no republican State ticket in nomination, and in only a few instances a county ticket to represent the republican party in the campaign of 1880. The ghost of intimidation doubtless presents itself to the mind of every republican within the sound of my voice at the very announcement of such a fact. But that such a thought is a mere phantom let me prove by printing as a portion of my remarks a letter received this morning from a resident lawyer of this city, who is perhaps the brightest intellect that South Carolina ever gave to the republican party. He has lately settled in this city, and yesterday afternoon I addressed him a note asking whether he was not a member of the republican State convention of South Carolina, and if he did not publish a letter advising against placing a republican ticket in the field. I have his reply, and will print it.

Many MEMBERS. Read it!

Mr. AIKEN. I will.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 5, 1881.

DEAR SIR: I have your favor of yesterday, and, in reply, would say that I did publish such a letter as you inquire about. The national republican party had been injured and that of the State broken down and ruined by our running unfit men for office. I knew we had not the material for a State ticket in South Carolina, and I felt confident that if we forebore to nominate one the democrats would be more likely to divide, run "independents," and thus sooner contribute the material needed to build up a respectable and strong republican party; one not in name merely, but in principle and usefulness. Entertaining these views, I declined most pressing solicitations to allow my name used before the convention.

I am, very truly, yours,

WM. E. EARLE.

Hon. D. WYATT AIKEN, House of Representatives.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is a letter from an intelligent South Carolinian, born and reared upon her soil, who is a republican from principle; and it contains two incontrovertible truths: first, that the republican party in South Carolina had not material enough in it from which to select a State ticket; and, secondly, that the only hope of securing that material is to dissever the democratic party. Think you, Mr. Speaker, does any gentleman on this floor suppose, that this end will be attained by arraying every two or four years in deadly political strife that party which so lacks material against the party alone that possesses it at the South? As well may you or they expect to break the "solid South" by continually heaping abuses upon those who compose it.

Mr. Speaker, my friend from Indiana, [Mr. CALKINS,] with much fervor and great emphasis, asks, What is a carpet-bagger? In reply I say he is a political legalized burglar: that is just what a carpet-bagger is, [laughter and applause on the democratic side;] and I say to my friend if he will come to South Carolina with a view of identifying himself with the State, intending to become a citizen, claiming the protection of that flag that floats over our Speaker's chair, and demanding the right to be recognized as a citizen, at the same time lending a helping hand toward developing the resources of that beautiful country, he will be received with open arms from the mountains to the sea-shore, and no questions will be asked as to his politics. But, sir, no such motives ever impelled the carpet-bagger to settle in South Carolina or any other Southern State. His was the visitation of a political adventurer, who, through the ignorance of the blacks, foisted himself upon the oppressed whites, whom he proceeded at once to tax to impoverishment, while he squandered in luxurious living every dollar poured into the treasury by the tax-gatherer. And yet my friend thinks it cruel to call such creatures "aliens." Why, sir, it is an honor to them to be recognized at all. I beg gentlemen to recall the history of my State during the carpet-bag régime and ask what has become of those tyrannical spendthrifts. Some of them doubtless have been hung, as I believe all of them should have been; some of them are to-day, I know, in the jails of the country, and others of them have had in more ways than one retributive justice meted out to them by an offended Providence. If there is one remaining in my State, I am not aware of it. And if they had all gone to that other estate, Heaven knows I would not have had a tear to shed at their demise.

Mr. Speaker, I need not reply to my friend's thrusts at the census of South Carolina further than to express a regret that he has thus publicly acknowledged his lack of information upon the subject. I suppose no gentleman on the other side of this Hall will question the integrity of character, the honesty of purpose, and the efficiency of the Superintendent of Census, General F. A. Walker. When the returns were made by the supervisors of South Carolina they were so far in excess of the population expected to be found in that State that at once the cry of fraud ran through the North from Maine to California. General Walker was compelled to yield to this pressure, and, himself startled at the supervisors' returns, he had no hesitation in at once resorting to the only method of disproving, if possible, their correctness. Indeed, he was instructed by the President "to send a staff of special agents from his office to South Carolina to conduct a re-enumeration, by a house-to-house canvass, of a certain number of townships, with a view to a further test of the results of the June enumeration." In his report, submitted on the 17th January last, which my friend had certainly never seen or he would not have manifested that fanaticism I so much regretted to see, General Walker says: "In compliance with these instructions, I detailed the late supervisor of census of the State of Vermont to conduct the proposed re-enumeration;" and he detailed as his assistants an enumerator from each of the following States: New York, Massachusetts, Maryland, and Michigan, all of whom were doubtless republicans. In speaking of these gentlemen General Walker says:

> They were selected for their known ability and proved integrity, and with reference to the fact that each of them had been accustomed to mounted service in rugged and difficult country, all of them having been in the Army of the United States.

I may say in passing, Mr. Speaker, that I fail to comprehend the peculiar adaptation of such qualifications in enumerators as are here mentioned to such service in South Carolina, for generally the country is neither "rugged" nor "difficult," and I am sure the United States will find no enemies to herself now lurking within the bounds of that State that ex-soldiers of the Army should have been employed to do this work. However, these several agents came to South Carolina and reported to the United States marshal, a republican of the stalwart type. The chief agent made his headquarters in Columbia and assigned the duty of re-enumerating to his assistants in eight different counties of the State, selected at will and without the least premonition to the people. The schedules of inhabitants as returned by the local enumerators in June, 1880, were committed to the special agent, but inspection was denied to each of his assistants, who were required to do their work thoroughly without reference to the first enumeration. The re-enumeration was made; noses were counted by these agents and their republican assistants tendered them in South Carolina by the United States marshal, and in almost every instance the re-enumeration exceeded the enumeration in June, 1880. And in submitting his report to the Secretary of the Interior General Walker closes with this paragraph:

> I cannot but believe that the result which I have now the honor to announce will be accepted as conclusive in favor of the integrity of the work done in June under the authority of the several supervisors of South Carolina.

From these official statements of facts, Mr. Speaker, I submit it to the magnanimity of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] whether it is not my duty to ask and should be his pleasure to grant a retraction of the unwarranted allegations he has made against the people and State of South Carolina?

Mr. Speaker, I am indebted to the House for their indulgence, and have only to regret that I could not have anticipated this discussion and prepared, as I could have done, a complete refutation of all the charges made against the freedom and fairness of southern elections.

Mr. BURROWS. One question before the gentleman takes his seat. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 706) for the relief of A. B. Rowden;

A bill (H. R. No. 735) for the relief of Dr. John Blankenship;

A bill (H. R. No. 4596) authorizing the survey of parts of certain townships in Crawford County, Wisconsin, and making appropriation therefor;

A bill (H. R. No. 6527) to grant to the corporate authorities of the city of Council Bluffs, in the State of Iowa, for public uses a certain lake known as Carr Lake, situate near said city; and

A bill (H. R. No. 6229) to grant the right of way for railroad purposes through certain lands of the United States in Richmond County, New York.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, with an amendment in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 6062) donating certain lands in Lake County, in the State of Colorado, to the Veteran Union Association of Leadville, for hospital and burial purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, of the following titles:

A bill (S. No. 1599) for the relief of Dr. A. Sidney Tebbs; and

A bill (S. No. 1874) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Quincy, in the State of Illinois.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATION.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill making an apportionment under the tenth census.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FINLEY. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COFFROTH.]

Mr. TILLMAN. As the time allotted to my colleague [Mr. AIKEN] has not been exhausted, I ask him to yield to me for two minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN] took his seat without claiming any further time, the Chair is obliged to recognize the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] as entitled to the floor.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield for that purpose?

Mr. FINLEY. I have yielded two minutes of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COFFROTH.]

Mr. COFFROTH. Mr. Speaker, through the kindness of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] I am permitted to submit the following bill, which at the proper time I will offer as an amendment to the bill now pending:

> A bill making an apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the tenth census.
> Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That after the 3d of March, 1883, the House of Representatives shall be composed of two hundred and forty-five members, to be apportioned among the several States as follows: Alabama, six; Arkansas, four; California, four; Colorado, one; Connecticut, three; Delaware, one; Florida, one; Georgia, seven; Illinois, fifteen; Indiana, ten; Iowa, eight; Kansas, five; Kentucky, eight; Louisiana, five; Maine, three; Maryland, five; Massachusetts, nine; Michigan, eight; Minnesota, four; Mississippi, six; Missouri, eleven; Nebraska, two; Nevada, one; New Hampshire, two; New Jersey, six; New York, twenty-five; North Carolina, seven; Ohio, sixteen; Oregon, one; Pennsylvania, twenty-one; Rhode Island, one; South Carolina, five; Tennessee, eight; Texas, eight; Vermont, two; Virginia, seven; West Virginia, three; Wisconsin, six.
> SEC. 2. That whenever a new State shall be admitted into the Union the Representative or Representatives assigned to it shall be additional to the number two hundred and forty-five herein provided for.
> SEC. 3. That in each State entitled under this apportionment the number to which such State may be entitled in the Forty-eighth and each subsequent Congress shall be elected by districts composed of contiguous territory and containing as nearly as practicable an equal number of inhabitants, and equal in number to the Representatives to which each State may be entitled in Congress, no one district electing more than one Representative.

Mr. Speaker, I will not now detain the House by offering any remarks on my amendment, but will content myself with submitting the following table showing the ratio for each member, hoping that before this discussion is over I will have an opportunity to submit my views:

Mr. FINLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SAMFORD] to make a motion that the House adjourn.

Mr. SAMFORD. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. COX. I hope we shall not adjourn now. Other members desire to speak. No vote is to be taken to-night.

Mr. FINLEY. I am willing either to go on now or to yield for the motion to adjourn, as may suit the temper of the House.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. SAMFORD, there were—ayes 62, noes 63.

Mr. CONGER. I call for tellers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No quorum having voted, the Chair is bound to order tellers; and appoints the gentleman from Maine, Mr. REED, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. COX.

Mr. SPARKS. No quorum is needed on a question of adjournment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But a further count is insisted upon; and when no quorum has voted the Chair is bound to appoint tellers if they be demanded.

Mr. SAMFORD. Have I the right to withdraw the motion to adjourn?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has that right.

Mr. SAMFORD. I withdraw it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] will proceed.

Mr. FINLEY. I will go on as soon as order is restored.

Mr. CONGER. I object to the withdrawal of the motion to adjourn. The House was dividing upon it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the House will come to order, the Chair will state the position of the question. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] yielded that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SAMFORD] might make a motion to adjourn. On that question the ayes were 62 and the noes 63.

Mr. CONGER. And I had demanded tellers; and the Chair ordered them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama thereupon withdrew his motion.

Mr. CONGER. He could not withdraw it while the House was dividing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the rule on the subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

A motion may be withdrawn at any time before a decision or amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to adjourn having been withdrawn, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] resumes the floor and will proceed.

Mr. CONGER. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will reduce his appeal to writing.

Mr. COX. I suppose we might as well adjourn if time is to be taken up in this way. As no vote is to be taken to-night, I supposed there would be no objection to members occupying the time awhile longer. We mean business now in this short session.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. If gentlemen on the other side want to filibuster on such a frivolous pretext, they may do so. We can stay here all night. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the appeal which has been taken from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Why does not the Chair put the question to the House? We cannot wait here until the gentleman from Michigan prepares his motions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan has the right, and under the rules is obliged, to reduce his appeal to writing.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. How long are we to wait?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not for the Chair to decide.

Mr. ATKINS. Did the gentleman take the appeal in time?

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. REED. That motion is not in order now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will entertain the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] after the appeal has been read. The appeal as reduced to writing will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

I appeal from the decision of the Chair that a motion to adjourn may be withdrawn while the House is dividing, and after the viva voce vote has been taken and announced.

Mr. SPRINGER. I now move to lay the appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs upon the motion that the appeal from the decision of the Chair be laid on the table.

Mr. CONGER demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The appeal from the decision of the Chair was then laid upon the table.

Mr. ATHERTON. I move the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's colleague [Mr. FINLEY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FINLEY. I feel somewhat embarrassed in attempting to speak at this late hour of the evening, especially with the feeling which seems to be manifested in the House against the continuance of this debate; but I will at the solicitation of gentlemen sitting about me proceed if I can have the attention of members.

Mr. CULBERSON. Will the gentleman yield to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. ATHERTON. I hope the gentleman will.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope he will not after the House has just determined not to adjourn.

Mr. FINLEY. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CULBERSON. I move the House adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 69, noes 45.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 72, nays 39, not voting 181; as follows:

DISTRICT MUNICIPAL CODE.

Mr. HARRIS. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take a recess to-morrow evening at such hour as may suit its convenience, and reassemble at the hour of seven or such other hour as may suit the convenience of the Senate, for the purpose of taking up at the evening session and having read the bill (H. R. No. 5541) to establish a municipal code for the District of Columbia. I desire to say that this being a bill of three hundred and thirty-five pages, having involved a large amount of labor at both ends of the Capitol, unless it can be acted upon finally in the Senate within the next eight or ten days it will be impossible for it to be enrolled and become a law at this session of Congress.

It is important that the bill should pass in some form, for the reason that in order to ascertain what the municipal laws of the District are to-day you have to look to the various acts of Congress, to the ordinances of the old corporations of Washington and Georgetown, to the ordinances of the levy court of the county, to the acts of the Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia, and perhaps to the laws of Maryland at the date of the cession. If the bill is to be acted upon at all in the present condition of the business of the Senate, I am sure that the Senate will have to grant to the committee a night session or two in order that it may be considered. I therefore ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that it take a recess to-morrow and assemble, say, at seven o'clock to-morrow evening for the purpose of taking the bill up.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest half past seven.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Iowa suggests half past seven. I will adopt his suggestion and say half past seven o'clock to-morrow night, for the purpose of taking the bill up and proceeding with its consideration, with the understanding, if it is desirable, that no final action shall be taken upon the bill or any amendment at that night session, but that it may be formally read.

Mr. THURMAN. I beg leave to say one word. As the Senator from Tennessee has said, this is a very important bill indeed. It is a bill about some of the provisions of which the greatest difference of opinion exists. It codifies, as I understand, the ordinances that have the effect of law in the District, and creates a multitude of offenses, or puts them in the form of a code, where heretofore they have existed in the various means stated by the Senator. In addition to that, the bill regulates taxation in the District. There are remonstrances against portions of the bill, there is a great difference of opinion about it, and the bill ought to receive the most careful consideration by the Senate, as it no doubt has by the committee.

I dislike very much to suggest that we ought not to meet to-morrow night for the sole purpose of reading the bill, because we perfectly well know that if we make that order and nothing is to be done but reading the bill the probabilities are that not a dozen Senators will be in their seats, and therefore the reading will be a mere matter of form, without instruction to a single human being. I would insist on that but for the fact that my experience has taught me that if the bill is read with a full Senate there will not be a dozen Senators who will listen to it. So that really there is very little difference between reading a bill without anybody in the Chamber and reading it with the full Senate when it is a bill as long as that.

Therefore, if the Senator insists upon asking leave, I will not, against the unanimous wish of his committee, object; but I do say that nothing ought to be done beyond the reading of it, and that I do hope Senators will not take it for granted that this bill is a thing that, having been once passed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, ought ex necessitate, or as a matter of course, to pass the Senate. There are some provisions in the bill to which I am, I think, opposed, and must be opposed, and never can be otherwise than opposed, and there are some provisions in it in regard to taxation to which other Senators are strongly opposed, and which give rise to a great diversity of sentiment among the people of this District. Whenever the bill shall be taken up I hope the Senate will be full, and that the bill will be carefully scrutinized and considered, and not passed sub silentio.

Mr. CONKLING. I have sometimes heard in the Senate and sometimes in the House a motion to waive the reading of a bill, or, as stated, to dispense with the reading of a bill. This motion in another form is that motion, and it is no part of my purpose to object to it; but I suggest to the honorable Senator from Tennessee whether he might not as well put it in that form and move to dispense with the formal reading of the bill. As the Senator from Ohio has said, nobody will come here at a night session to hear the bill read. It is merely a mode of satisfying the rule which requires the reading in extenso; and I think the Senator will very likely comply more fully with his own wish and equally conserve everything which belongs to the reading of the bill if he will make that motion.

After hearing the honorable Senator from Ohio I wish to add a word for myself to what he has said so well. I have received for some time, now quite recently, from several very respectable sources, from men of thought and integrity as I know them, urgent remonstrances against various provisions of the bill, and it contains perhaps beyond the indication made by its length a great variety of matters. Although the District of Columbia is small geographically, and although it is dealt with here sometimes in rather a casual way, I must think not from any fault of the very vigilant and able Committee on the District but because of the fault of the rest of us, with a little less consideration than would be given to the concerns of a State were they involved, the District of Columbia contains a good many people and people who have specially beyond anybody else a right to expect that the two Houses of Congress, having complete control over their affairs, will be circumspect in exercising that control.

I trust that this bill, certainly some of its provisions, will never become a law until after the Senate has given a patient and serious consideration to those provisions.

I think the Senator from Tennessee could very likely get unanimous consent to dispense with the formal reading of his bill, and thus avoid the night session that he moves. I do not object to that; I do not think anything is to be gained by reading it; but I only say this word in the hope that when the bill comes to be considered we shall all of us feel it to be our duty to give such attention to it as its importance demands.

Mr. HARRIS. My object is to secure for the bill consideration in the Senate. It would be preferable to me if a day could be given, and I would desire the attention and the earnest attention of every Senator to each and all of its provisions. The committee does not claim for either the bill or itself perfection; nor perhaps is the bill in all of its provisions satisfactory to every member of the committee; but it is the result of the conclusion of the House of Representatives and a majority of the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia. It is important that the laws of the District should be codified and put into convenient shape.

In answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio, I will say that, with the exception of the subject of taxation, the bill is substantially the laws as they now exist in the District of Columbia, however wise or unwise they may be in many of their provisions; but I do not see the remote probability if indeed there is a possibility of securing for the bill such consideration as will result in the final action of the Senate upon it, unless the Senate will grant to the committee a session for a night or two for its consideration. I would greatly prefer, if the Senate would consent to it, to fix an early day when the bill may be taken up and dispense with the formal reading, if it suits the views of a majority of the Senate or of the whole Senate so to do; but the thing I desire is consideration and action upon the bill according to whatever may be the judgment of the Senate in respect to it.

Mr. INGALLS. The rules require that every bill shall have three readings, and that those readings shall be on separate days, unless the Senate shall otherwise direct. I have known since I have been in the Senate but one instance where a bill has passed without being read at all, and that was in the case of the adoption of the Revised Statutes, and I believe that we have not yet quite got through with the errors that resulted from that method of legislation. In the interest of what seems to me to be absolutely essential to the due consideration of public business, I should object to dispensing with the reading of this bill at least once, inasmuch as three readings are required, and two of course would be by title.

Mr. CONKLING. It has been read twice, has it not?

Mr. INGALLS. By its title.

Mr. CONKLING. Already?

Mr. INGALLS. It was read twice before it was referred to the committee. I hope the suggestion made by the Senator from Tennessee will be agreed to, because it is establishing an exceedingly vicious, dangerous, and detrimental precedent to say that any bill may be passed here without being once at least read at length.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion there?

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. I quite concur with what the Senator says, and I know very well that there could not be a more perfect illustration than that which he cites of the Revised Statutes, which were tied up and passed without the strings ever being cut; but I suggest to the Senator from Kansas, and to the Senator from Tennessee too, suppose the Senate agree to take the bill up next Thursday and read it section by section and act on each section as it is read. There will then be a thorough and an intelligent reading of the bill. The only difference will be that, instead of reading it right straight through, you read it section by section and act upon it as the sections are read. It fulfills the rule.

Mr. WHYTE. Acting upon the amendments at the same time?

Mr. THURMAN. Acting upon the amendments to a section after you take it up. That fully complies with the rule, and it is a full and complete reading of the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. The only reason why that course should not be adopted in my mind is this: there are but three points in the bill upon which in my judgment any considerable debate is likely to arise. Those are, first, the question of compulsory education; second, the question of taxation; and third, the question of issuing licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage. I believe, with those three exceptions, the bill is substantially in a shape at the present time to command the assent of the Senate; but the reason why the course suggested by the Senator from Ohio could not be pursued is this: as has been frequently suggested by him, if we consider the bill in open Senate on Thursday next there will not be ten Senators in their places to hear it read.

Mr. THURMAN. If it is read section by section, and each section is acted on as it is read, the whole Senate will be here.

Mr. INGALLS. We have been discussing the pension bill for the last week; we discussed the Indian severalty bill for ten days previously; and during the greater portion of that time there were not enough here to constitute even a majority of a quorum.

Mr. THURMAN. But does not the Senator think that when the question comes up about stopping the license for the sale of grog in the District there will be a full Senate?

Mr. INGALLS. There will undoubtedly be a full attendance of the democratic side of the Senate. So far as this side is concerned, I am not able to speak with so much certainty. Still I think the course suggested by the Senator from Tennessee is right, that the bill should be once read formally in open Senate; and I hope he will continue to ask unanimous consent for that, with the understanding that the bill shall be read formally on the evening session and that there is to be no action taken on the bill or any of its amendments. That seems to me to be the best course that can be pursued.

Mr. CONKLING. I am not willing to let this pass by without correcting an impression which I seem to have made.

Mr. INGALLS. Before the Senator from New York proceeds, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] has asked me a question, and with his permission I should like to answer it. He inquired how long it would take to read the bill. There are three hundred and thirty-five pages, and my judgment is that it will require four or five hours of continuous labor on the part of the Clerk to read the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, if the honorable Senator should state how long it would take him to listen to its reading, that would have been a much more curious answer than the one he has given.

The Senator from Kansas fell into the understanding—doubtless it was my fault—that I advocated the passage of this bill, or some other bill, without complying with the rule for reading it. Never. I agree with the Senator it ought not to be done. The suggestion I made to the Senator from Tennessee was this; and I repeat it: to fix an hour to-morrow night or any other night when a bill is to be read, particularly a bill applicable to the District, a local bill, with the notice that nothing is to be done save only the reading of that bill, is to bring nobody here. The Senator from Ohio said there would not be a dozen Senators to listen to it. I undertake to say that not one Senator will listen to it unless it be some member of the committee who feels bound to attend to see that the reading takes place. I repeat that that is virtually dispensing with the reading of the bill; it is a mere circumlocution motion to effect that result, that the reading of the bill in extenso shall be dispensed with. If that is to be done, if the bill is not to be read effectively and really for the information of anybody, it makes no difference whether you come to that by saying it shall be read by the Secretary in the absence of the Senate, at a night session, when nobody will come for that purpose, or by saying that it shall be dispensed with altogether. So I concur entirely with my friend as to the improvidence of passing bills which are not formally read.

I begin now, after hearing him, to have more hopes of the attention of the Senate, because I see that he and the Senator from Ohio have found a party question in the bill, a question relating to the freedom with which there shall be dispensed in this District that beverage which is supposed to be so warming and agreeable to the democratic stomach, and which is supposed to furnish so much of the political inspiration of one of the two great organizations of the country. Pinning my faith upon that, I hope now that this whole bill, knowing that that part of it will receive consideration not only from the minority of the Senate having little interest as they may have in the particular point, but also from that majority which has in hands not only the other interests of the Republic but most especially and tenderly that great industrial interest.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I am anxious that that question should come up. I want to see how far our friends on the other side of the Chamber will fulfill their promises to the temperance people. I am extremely anxious to see that. I want to know whether they are to get the temperance vote from year to year by holding out a promise that is never fulfilled. I want the yeas and nays on that, and I want every man who votes in favor of the prohibitory clause to give evidence that he will immediately go and join the temperance society and become a Son of Jonadab, or some such name as that, or a Knight of Temperance, or something of that kind. I want Senators on the other side of the Chamber to show their hands fully and fairly on that great question of temperance reform. No doubt they will do it; no doubt they will vote for a prohibitory law. There is no question about that. Every man of them will no doubt do it, or if they will not do that, they will vote for a local-option law, or some kind of a contrivance by which they can still hold the temperance vote at the same time that they are not bound by any temperance obligation.

Mr. President, when the time comes I shall vote, I will say frankly and squarely, for license, for I have seen the effects of not granting license. The constitution of the State of Ohio of 1851 prohibited licenses being granted for the sale of spirituous liquors, and for one drinking place that was in Ohio when that constitutional prohibition was adopted there have been at least two ever since; and it will be so wherever it is tried. I therefore am willing to stand up, not only in vindication of my own rights, but as a moral reformer, as a man who believes as much as any one does in the evil that results from intemperance; but the system of no licenses, wherever it has been tried, has resulted in injury to public morals and public health.

This is a bill, according to the statement made by the Senator from Kansas, which I think is likely to occupy very considerable time. To say nothing about this spiritual question which interests us all so much, the other question of compulsory education, the claim that you shall compel a father to send his children to a school that he is utterly opposed to as a means of his children's education, that you shall violate his right of conscience and his parental power in that way, is another thing upon which some few observations will be made whenever this bill is brought up. And then there is the question of taxation, which is so interesting in this District, and which has undergone so much discussion within the last few years here and elsewhere.

But, sir, I am out of order in discussing the merits of the bill now. I think that the only way in which the bill ever will be considered, and considered carefully, is that which I have suggested, to take it up on some day when we can agree to take it up and read it section by section, and consider it section by section, and thus comply with the rule and thus secure a careful consideration of the bill. I do not believe myself that the bill can be put through under a ten days' debate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the Senator from Tennessee to ask the Senate to consent that an order be entered that a session of the Senate be held to-morrow evening, commencing at half past seven, for a simple reading of the bill establishing a municipal code for the District of Columbia. Is there objection?

Mr. THURMAN. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. HARRIS. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to present the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That on and after Tuesday, the 8th of February, 1881, the Senate will take a recess at —— o'clock p. m., and meet at seven o'clock p. m., for the purpose of considering House bill No. 5541, entitled "An act to establish a municipal code for the District of Columbia," and will continue so to meet each day until the same shall have been finally acted upon by the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. Let that go over.

Mr. HOAR. Is that an amendment to the rules?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, it is a special order really.

Mr. CONKLING. Whatever it is, it cannot be considered now.

Mr. HARRIS. One objection carries it over of course.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution goes over.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 543) for the relief of Jabez Burchard.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded, which is the consideration of the Calendar of General Orders.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report of the Secretary of the Interior in reply to the resolution I had the honor to offer.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order having been demanded——

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move to set aside the regular order for the present.

Mr. HARRIS. I understand the Senator from South Carolina desires to call up a report for the purpose of submitting some remarks on it. I suppose, of course, the Senate will consent to that.

Mr. BUTLER. I announced on Saturday that I would call it up.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Will not the Senator from South Carolina yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BUTLER. I will yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania if I can get the floor afterwards.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania had the floor, and yielded to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I wish to ask a question of the Chair. I ask what is the regular order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is the consideration of the Calendar of General Orders under the standing order of the day, the Anthony rule, until half past one.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. When the Senate adjourned on Saturday evening it had under consideration a bill known as a bill for the relief of Messrs. Sigsbee and Sands. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. ROLLINS] persisted in holding the floor, and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. BURNSIDE] moved an adjournment pending the consideration of that measure, and I wished to know at the time whether the Senator from New Hampshire intended to permit the other side of that question to be heard, or whether he simply intended to hold the floor to force an adjournment so that the mouths of other Senators on that subject should be shut, and if that kind of tactics is to be tolerated here I wish to know it.

Mr. ROLLINS. Mr. President, I am very much surprised to hear the remarks of the honorable Senator from Florida. I was upon the floor addressing the Senate with reference to the bill reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, and Senators will bear witness that I very seldom trouble the Senate in that way. I had occupied some ten or fifteen minutes of the Senate's valuable time, and I had not concluded my remarks when the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. BURNSIDE] addressed the Chair and appealed to me to yield the floor for that purpose. All I ask of the Senate is that I may have an opportunity of finishing my remarks, and then there will be ample opportunity, of course, for any other Senator to address the Senate. It is not my purpose, and was not my purpose, to stop the mouth of any Senator, much more that of my friend from the State of Florida, a Senator whom I respect so much. I would be the last man to stop him from speaking.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, so much has been said about the census frauds in South Carolina that I feel——

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Will the Senator give way now for a moment?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I ask for the consideration of Senate bill No. 543.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. INGALLS. Regular order.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the regular order be set aside.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from South Carolina is on the floor.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. He yielded the floor to me.

Mr. BUTLER. I will say to my honorable friend from Pennsylvania that I shall not occupy much time, and after I get through I will assist him in getting up his bill.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. It does not require any assistance; its merits will pass the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, what is before the Senate now?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is endeavoring to find out. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] is before the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there a resolution before the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina, the Chair understands, desires to address the Senate on the report of the Secretary of the Interior in reply to a resolution submitted by him.

Mr. BUTLER. I desire to address the Senate on the report from the Secretary of the Interior made in response to a resolution which I offered in reference to the alleged census frauds in South Carolina. That report I have asked the Senate to consider.

ALLEGED FRAUDS IN SOUTH CAROLINA'S CENSUS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the Senator from South Carolina proceeding? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, so much has been said about census frauds in South Carolina that I beg to call the especial attention of the Senate to the letter of the honorable Secretary of the Interior of January 17, 1881, communicating the letter of General Francis A. Walker, Superintendent of the Census, of the 15th January.

This letter is written in response to a resolution of the Senate which I had the honor to offer, "requesting and directing the Secretary of the Interior to forward for the information of the Senate the report of the Superintendent of the Census touching the alleged frauds of the enumeration of the inhabitants of South Carolina under the law providing for taking the tenth census." It answers so completely the charges made from time to time by partisan stump-orators and subsidized organs that I shall ask the Clerk to read it for the information of the Senate and the country.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 15, 1881.

SIR: I have the honor to be in receipt of Department letter of the 7th instant, inclosing a resolution of the Senate requesting and directing the Secretary of the Interior to forward, for the information of the Senate, the report of the Superintendent of the Census touching the alleged frauds of the enumeration of the inhabitants of South Carolina under the law providing for taking the tenth census.

In compliance with the instructions of the Department, I have the honor to transmit herewith a printed copy of the report in question.

The investigation, the results of which are set forth in this report, was conducted by Mr. Henry Gannett, special agent of this office, between the 7th and the 21st of September.

The method adopted was the verification of names appearing upon the schedules of eighteen enumeration districts, in six different counties, through personal inquiry of prominent citizens familiar with the residents of their respective localities and of undoubted probity.

During the month of November I received oral instructions from the President to send a staff of special agents from this office to South Carolina to conduct a re-enumeration, by a house-to-house canvass, of a certain number of townships, with a view to a further test of the results of the June enumeration.

In compliance with these instructions I detailed F. G. Butterfield, esq., late supervisor of census for the State of Vermont, and now of this office, as chief special agent to conduct the proposed re-enumeration. The following persons were detailed as assistants to perform the actual work of enumeration:

Timothy Quinn, of New York; John B. Burt, of Massachusetts; John B. Isler, of Maryland; O. P. D. Stone, of Michigan.

These gentlemen were selected for their known ability and proved integrity, and with reference also to the fact that each of them had been accustomed to mounted service in rugged and difficult country; all of them having been in the Army of the United States.

Eight townships, situated in as many different counties, were, upon the recommendation of Colonel R. M. Wallace, marshal, taken for re-enumeration.

Two townships were assigned to each of the four assistant special agents. The schedules of inhabitants returned in the June enumeration were placed in the hands of the chief special agent. The several assistant special agents assigned to the actual enumeration of the townships were not shown these schedules, but were required to perform their work ab initio, without reference to the first enumeration. Their note-books, containing the description of every house in the township, as to location, material of construction, and general character, together with the name of each member of the family resident therein, were to be submitted to the chief special agent, having his headquarters at Columbia, who was instructed to make a careful comparison, name by name, of the results of the two enumerations.

The enumeration of seven of the townships in question was completed a week or two since, but owing to the large extent and considerable population of Waterloo Township, I was not advised until yesterday of the completion of the work in that district.

The following table gives the population of each township as ascertained in the re-enumeration just described:

| County. | Township. | Reported at June enumeration. | Reported in December and January. |
|---|---|---|---|
| Abbeville | Due West | 2,457 | 2,576 |
| Barnwell | Williston | 2,669 | 2,723 |
| Chesterfield | Steerpen | 2,080 | 2,090 |
| Fairfield | Township No. 8 | 2,559 | 2,685 |
| Laurens | Waterloo | 4,018 | 4,150 |
| Lexington | Broad River | 2,426 | 2,441 |
| Marion | Cains | 2,405 | 2,480 |
| Williamsburgh | Johnson | 2,397 | 2,463 |
| Total | | 21,011 | 21,608 |

It will be seen that in every township on this list an increase appears in the December and January enumeration over the June enumeration. This increase is due partly to the normal increase of population, which might easily be, in seven months, 1½ per cent.; partly to changes in population, such as frequently occur in rural communities, as between summer and winter; which changes, had a hundred townships been taken, would probably have offset each other, but which in so few as eight might easily leave an appreciable balance, to the gain or the loss, according to circumstances of the particular group of townships taken, and partly also, it is probable, to the greater care and thoroughness with which the last enumeration has been conducted.

It was not to be expected that the average of the four hundred and eighty-seven enumerators of South Carolina should be equal to that of a corps of selected officers, each of whom had had far more than the usual experience of life and of public service, all excellent scouts and horsemen, provided with guides, maps, &c., without regard to expense. It is not improbable, therefore, that the final result may show a score or two of families in these eight townships who were omitted by the June enumerators, either through inadvertency or on account of some peculiar difficulty arising from the location of their dwellings.

The ordinary enumerator, canvassing a territory of fifty, sixty, or eighty square miles, might, without any great fault of his own, omit two or three cabins hidden away in ravines, sheltered by trees, and occupied by families having but very little of business or of social connection with the rest of the community.

I may, perhaps, be excused for remarking that in discussions relating to the census of the Southern States it needs always to be borne in mind that the most characteristic difference in the matter of residence, as between the Northern and the Southern States, is found in the location of dwelling-houses. As a rule in the Northern States houses are placed upon highways; as a rule in the Southern States houses are not so placed. In the Northern States families are habitually supplied with water from wells; in the Southern States they are habitually supplied with water from springs or running streams, and hence it is proximity to a natural water supply which determines the location of houses. Any one who has traveled throughout that region will not fail to acknowledge the truth of this general remark.

Time has not been given for a full comparison of the names upon the lists furnished by the two enumerations, which work will be completed upon special agent Butterfield's return to Washington.

In general he has advised this office that the results of the comparison, so far as it has been carried out, have been such as to corroborate the original enumeration.

I cannot but believe, however, that the result which I have now the honor to announce will be accepted as conclusive in favor of the integrity of the work done in June under the authority of the several supervisors of South Carolina.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

FRANCIS A. WALKER,

Hon. CARL SCHURZ, Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. BUTLER. This full and complete reply to the imputations of unfairness and fraud ought to satisfy the minds of all men and put to shame the authors of the baseless calumnies; but I am not content to stop here. A certain republican stump orator on a certain occasion in New York City, where there was evidently an uncontrollable desire to "fire the hearts" of his audience, concluded that a just and honest recital of the truth would fail of that purpose, and therefore chose the following language of insult and misrepresentation as a more potent appliance for the occasion:

Perhaps this point will seem to you to challenge some attention. For the population of Southern States we must go back to the census of 1870. That count of the people was made by enumerators not selected by Southern Senators and members of the House as "non-partisans" and professional reformers. It was made by the regular marshals and their deputies, and the compensation was so adjusted as to induce thorough visitation and at the same time to guard against exaggeration of numbers. No imputation of fraud was ever cast upon the work. Such a thing as a plot to fabricate a monstrous increase of population in one section in order to baffle the course of nature and the logic of events in another—a plot to change the balance of power and population in order to aggrandize one section by establishing a false basis of representation and apportionment, thus robbing other sections of their share in governing the country, in levying taxes and appropriating money, had not at that time occurred to the conservative foes of radicalism. That particular spoke in the wheel of deviltry had not turned up to the shifty patriot of that day. Now such schemes seem to wax apace. We read of producing false heirs to thrones and estates, but to multiply false heirs without any one to personate them on a scale so grand as seems now in process, would stupefy the ingenuity of a French novelist, or anybody else except a thoroughgoing, non-partisan conservative disciple of the democratic persuasion, wanting nothing for himself, but ready to do and suffer for a white man's government with "reform" and "a change."

The same orator makes also the following gratuitous fling:

This is the ordinance of higher power than a South Carolina census-taker.

And in the course of the harangue of the aforesaid stump-orator broadside after broadside of figures, problem after problem in arithmetic, ingeniously ciphered out, were hurled at the South; plausible and delusive, calculated to deceive, but as disingenuous and unfair as the intellect that fabricated them and malignant in their purpose as the heart that inspired their utterance.

In a letter dated October 5, 1880, General Walker, the able and accomplished Superintendent of the Census, submits to the acting Secretary of the Interior, Hon. Alonzo Bell, some tables and observations which I shall take leave to notice. He says:

The following table exhibits the population of each of the counties of the State of South Carolina at the ninth and at the tenth census, respectively. The figures for 1880 are subject to possible slight changes by reason of the discovery of the duplication or omission of individuals or families.

In the above table there has been added to the population, in 1880, of Barnwell County, 10,891, a part of the population of Aiken County; to the population of Edgefield, 13,148, on the same account; to the population of Lexington County, 1,663, on the same account; to the population of Orangeburgh County, 2,420, on the same account; and to the population of Beaufort County, 18,767, being the population of Hampton County in 1880, the latter county having been taken entire from Lexington since 1870.

These tables show the population of South Carolina to have been, according to the census of 1870, 705,606, and of 1880, 995,306, an increase in ten years of 289,700—41.06 per cent.

The enumeration of 1870 was made under republican auspices, "by republican marshals and their deputies," not "by enumerators selected by Southern Senators and members of the House as non-partisans and professional reformers." Never! The bitterest enemies and most accomplished slanderers of "Southern Senators and members of the House" cannot charge them with such a puerile abortion.

Some at least of the republican "Senators and members of the House" of that day of corruption and partisanship are entitled to, and shall have, the credit of the paternity of that deformed offspring. It is of a piece with almost all else that was done in the halcyon days of republican domination in this Capitol. Let us see what the present Superintendent of the Census says about it—a republican and a gentleman of ability, culture, and honesty, whose confirmation Southern Senators are quite willing to be responsible for, and who, I believe, does not share the distinction with his present accusers of many things done in 1870. The following extracts from his letter of October 5, 1880, will vindicate his own work and the work of his subordinates in South Carolina against the unjust aspersions of those who can see no good outside of the radical junta.

The following table shows the population of certain enumeration districts in 1880 as compared with the figures of 1870:

| County. | Civil division. | 1870. | 1880. | Per cent. |
| Edgefield | Pickens Township | 1,559 | 3,939 | 153 |
| | Norris Township | 1,485 | 2,958 | 100 |
| Greenville | Grove Township | 1,089 | 2,361 | 117 |
| | Gantt Township | 844 | 1,731 | 105 |
| | Greenville Township (outside the village) | 378 | 2,152 | 469 |
| Kershaw | De Kalb Township | 1,571 | 6,088 | 288 |
| Orangeburgh | Orange Township | 997 | 3,906 | 292 |
| | Hebron Township | 311 | 960 | 209 |
| | Liberty Township | 408 | 1,215 | 198 |
| | Orangeburgh Court House | 246 | 2,140 | 770 |
| Spartanburgh | Spartanburgh Court House | 1,080 | 3,253 | 201 |

This last table presents a most remarkable commentary upon the census of 1870, against which, we are told, "no imputation of fraud was ever cast."

At Orangeburgh Court House the census of 1870 gave a population of 246, that of 1880 of 2,140, an increase of 770 per cent. The enumeration of 1870 is so ridiculously absurd, that a stranger who had never seen the town, upon the most casual observation, would pronounce it false. And so of Greenville Township in Greenville County, and of De Kalb Township in Kershaw County, and of all the "minor civil divisions" in which comparisons have been made.

And, I think, we have much greater right to assume that there was in 1870 a plot to fabricate a monstrous decrease of population in one section, "a plot to change the balance of power and population in order to aggrandize one section by establishing a false basis of representation and apportionment" in the South. Such "a particular spoke in the wheel of deviltry" of that day would have fitted so aptly with other "spokes of deviltry" of the radical wheel and have been so easily adjustable, that no great stretch of the imagination would be required to fasten the charge of fraud upon the ninth census and those who then "plotted" against the South in more ways than one. But let us have General Walker's version of the controversy. After some preliminary observations, he says:

The error lying between the two censuses indicated, it would at the first glance appear, that a strong presumption existed that it was the census of 1880 which was at fault, the census of 1870 being a census taken and completed, a census accepted by the proper Department at Washington, and incorporated into its reports to Congress, and made the basis of a redistribution of representation by the act of 1872. Unfortunately, however, the authority of the census of 1870 in some sections of the country was not such as to create a very powerful presumption against the subsequent census by reason of marked discrepancies appearing therein.

The census of 1870 was taken under the act of 1850, an act by the provisions of which the control of the Census Office over the enumeration was reduced to a minimum, the authority attaching to the office being altogether insufficient, to any considerable degree of responsibility, for the results reported.

In his report of November 1, 1872, the Superintendent of Census characterized this act in the following terms, to which, after the further experience of eight years, he would, if possible, add emphasis rather than subtract from the force of the condemnation expressed:

"It is not possible for one who has had such painful occasion as the present Superintendent to observe the workings of the census law of 1850 to characterize it otherwise than as clumsy, antiquated, and barbarous.

"The machinery it provides is as unfit for use in the census of the United States in this day of advanced statistical science as the smooth-bore, muzzle-loading Queen's arm of the Revolution would be for service against the repeating rifle of the present time. It ought not to be possible that another census should be taken under this law; such a thing ought not to be seriously proposed.

"The country has suffered more than enough already of discredit and of loss on account of the wretched insufficiency and inappropriateness of the provisions of this ill-constructed and outgrown statute."

By the act thus characterized the charge of the enumeration in the several judicial districts was committed to the United States marshals, officers appointed with reference to altogether different services, and already burdened with a great variety and extent of duties in connection with the courts. These officers were, moreover, not appointed, and were not removable, at the instance of the Census Office or of the Department of the Interior, but belonged to another Department of the Government, to which they were responsible. In the formation of the subdivisions of their districts for census purposes, the marshals were subject to no control whatever on the part of the Census Office, while they were, by law, permitted to constitute districts, in their own discretion, not exceeding 20,000 inhabitants.

But even worse in its effects upon the integrity and completeness of the enumeration was the provision of the act of 1850, by which the United States marshals were left to appoint their assistants—the actual enumerators—without any check or control on the part of the Census Office. Whatever the vices of any individual appointment, or however low the general tone of appointments in any district might be, the Census Office had no power except that of a barren protest, its right to make such a protest even being seriously a subject of question. The Census Office had not even authority or appropriation to send an agent to inspect the office of the United States marshal during the progress of the enumeration.

The absence as above indicated of any power in the Census Office, first over the appointment of marshals themselves—the supervisors of enumerations; secondly, over the subdivision of the territory for the purposes of enumeration; and thirdly, over the appointment of assistant marshals—the actual enumerators—will be seen to justify the statement made above, that, under the act of 1850, the authority attached to the Census Office was insufficient to any considerable degree of responsibility for the results reported. In this condition the question whether the census of any judicial district should be a good one or a bad one became a question simply whether the United States marshal, appointed with reference to altogether different considerations, was himself competent to conduct the delicate and difficult work of supervising the census; whether he would give to the subject sufficient time and attention, in spite of other and pressing duties, and whether he would show good judgment and integrity in the subdivision of his district and in the appointment of his assistants. I have always been free in attributing to the United States marshals of 1870, as a body, a high sense of their duty in this respect and great zeal and vigilance. In preparing for and supervising the enumeration the marshals for 1870, as a body, did far more and better than was to have been expected of them in respect to this onerous duty imposed upon them, in addition to the regular work of their office. Moreover, the assistant marshals of 1870 were generally of good clerical abilities and good character, who labored faithfully in their calling, and made, as a rule, neat and intelligent returns.

While the foregoing remarks respecting the deficiencies of the system in use at the ninth census apply indifferently to all the districts of the country, North and South, peculiar difficulties attended the enumeration at the South in 1870. The disturbed state of society in the States lately in rebellion and the supposed necessity of appointing the assistant marshals wholly from the dominant political party, the members of which, in some sections, were drawn almost exclusively from the race lately emancipated by the effects of war, combined to reduce to a very low point the assurance which the country could have of a good census being taken under such a thoroughly bad organization as that provided by the act of 1850. It is not necessary for me to recite facts of record showing the manner in which the State governments of more than one State were at that time administered to prove that there was no very strong probability that the appointments made to the office of assistant marshal in those States would be uniformly good.

There was, moreover, lacking in 1870, throughout this general region, one very important safeguard of enumeration, namely, public interest in the result and general intelligence as to the population likely to be shown by the canvass. The interest generally manifested throughout the United States in the ninth census was far below that which has been shown the present year; but nowhere did the interest in the work of the census fall as low as in the States referred to, in which political activity under the Constitution of the United States had scarcely revived, and some of which had only just been restored to their representation in Congress and in the electoral college. Public interest in the result of the enumeration is oftentimes very troublesome to the officers of the census; but it is as wholesome as troublesome, since, while it frequently leads to unreasonable complaints, it almost certainly calls attention to any actual omissions from the enumeration and to any negligence on the part of the agents of the census.

Moreover, there could, in 1870, be no intelligent expectation at the South as to the population which should be shown by the census. No statistician could, at that time, claim to be able to make even an approximate estimate of the population of any Southern State. What would be found to be the effects upon population of four years of devastating civil war, involving vast loss of life, with diminution of vitality on the part of the survivors, the separation of husbands and wives, and the procrastination of marriage on the part of the young, throughout a population of which all able-bodied adult males were declared by law to be soldiers, subject to be called to arms at any moment? What would be the effects upon the distribution of the colored population, as between States and counties, of their recent emancipation, leaving them for the first time free to place themselves according to their interest or their fancy? These were questions which the best-informed student of population could not have presumed in 1870 to answer. There was, consequently, on the eve of the ninth census, no intelligent estimate possible on the part of any southern community as to the population which would be found to exist; and hence there could be no intelligent criticism of the results of the census as announced by the marshals of the several judicial districts. Scarcely any result as to population was incredible in a region over which armies had been passing for four years, to the destruction of crops, of houses, of fences, and of agricultural implements, and in which one-third, one-half, or, as in the so-called "Black Belt," two-thirds, four-fifths, and even seven-eighths of the population were, for the first time in their lives, as the result of the war, left free to choose their own location and mode of living.

INVESTIGATION OF THE RESULTS REPORTED IN 1880.

From the above considerations this office was not disposed, on the first announcement of the extraordinary apparent gain of population from 1870 to 1880, to conclude that it was necessarily the census of 1880 which was in fault, and therenpon to charge upon the 10,000 officers engaged in the service throughout the Southern States the perpetration of a monstrous political crime through a gigantic conspiracy to falsify the census. Knowing that the provisions of law at the tenth census were infinitely better suited to accomplish the purposes of a correct enumeration than in 1870; knowing that in South Carolina the work of supervision had not, as in 1870, been intrusted to a single officer already overworked in the performance of the regular duties of the marshal's office, but to three officers, each of whom gave many months of arduous labor to the work of preparation and supervision; knowing that in place of one hundred and twenty-one enumeration districts, as in 1870, covering an average area of two hundred and eighty square miles, there had been, at the recent count, four hundred and eighty-seven districts, each covering an average area of only sixty-nine square miles, securing, as a necessary result, a far higher degree of local and personal knowledge on the part of the enumerators of the districts to be canvassed by them respectively; knowing that the enumerators were no longer chosen from a single party, but were taken from the mass of citizens without any restriction on account of supposed partisan necessities; knowing all these things, I felt that the question, whether the census of 1870 or that of 1880 were in fault, should be approached and investigated without any strong presumption in favor of the former enumeration. The result of this investigation I have now the honor to state.

The method chosen for dealing with the question of the accuracy of the recent enumeration was a direct test of the count in certain districts. The districts taken for the purpose were, of course, among those situated in the counties respecting which the apparent gain from the ninth to the tenth census was the most extraordinary. They were also, in general, the districts which exhibited the largest gains within their respective counties, though considerations of convenience in reaching such districts by public conveyance, and in testing the count with the assistance of officials and citizens of undoubted probity, were admitted in the selection of the districts to be so canvassed. For the purpose of this investigation I detailed Mr. Henry Gannett, special agent. The honorable Attorney-General, at the request of this office, instructed the United States marshal of South Carolina to cooperate with Mr. Gannett in the work of investigation. Similar instructions were issued by the Internal Revenue Department to the collector of internal revenue of the State of South Carolina, Mr. Brayton, and a general letter of introduction was addressed from the Post-Office Department to the route agents of that Department.

Mr. Gannett left Washington on the 7th of September, accompanied by Mr. R. M. Barnitz, one of the most capable clerks of this office, and returned to the city on the 21st of September. I inclose a copy of his report, showing his proceedings under this commission.

It appears that Mr. Gannett visited six counties of South Carolina, being counties which showed extraordinary gains since 1870, and in those counties visited in all eighteen enumeration districts. In each of these enumeration districts the list of inhabitants returned to this office were subjected to examination by United States officials or by citizens. In general, these citizens were introduced and vouched for by the United States marshal of the judicial district, or by the United States collector of internal revenue, as not only men of reputation, but, with two exceptions only, as also recognized members of the republican party. In each of the eighteen districts in succession the names of inhabitants were so far identified as put it beyond a doubt, first, that the census of 1870 in each of these districts was grossly defective, and secondly, that the census of 1880 was substantially well taken. In no instance did anything appear which bore the semblance of fraud in the returns made to this office by the enumerators of 1880. In some districts nearly every family was identified as resident in the township, notwithstanding the great extent of the South Carolina townships, some of which embrace one hundred and even two hundred square miles. In all cases the identification was carried far enough to put it beyond a doubt that the fault of the impossible gains reported over the census of 1870 lay with the preceding enumeration.

It appears to me that the report of Mr. Gannett satisfactorily settles the question as to the fairness of the tenth census in South Carolina. It must be remembered that no reason existed for suspecting that enumeration beyond the fact of the extraordinary gain over the reported population of 1870. The supervisors of South Carolina are men of unimpeached character. Two of them are republicans who were appointed upon the strong and urgent recommendation of United States officials resident within that State, and of other persons highly connected in the past with the republican party. Of one of them, (Colonel Pride,) Hon. D. H. Chamberlain, late governor of South Carolina, wrote:

"He is a man of great energy, thoroughly acquainted with all parts of the State, apt and experienced in business affairs, with habits of accuracy and method which are of great value. He is a sincere southern republican, a member of that party in adversity as well as in prosperity. He is a good citizen, a good republican, and a good business man."

The third supervisor, a moderate democrat, is a man of the highest social connections and standing; a man of culture and of learning.

Not one complaint has ever reached this office respecting the general character of the enumerators appointed in any of the three supervisors' districts of South Carolina, or impeaching the fitness of a single enumerator appointed in that State. No specific allegation of fraud in the enumeration of South Carolina has ever been made to this office. The entire ground for impeaching the integrity of the recent census was found in the reported gain of population between 1870 and 1880. The results of the investigation hereinbefore detailed place beyond possible question by any fair-minded man the entire fault upon the census of 1870. I know of no reason, therefore, why any further charge should be made against the enumeration recently brought to a conclusion by the commissioned and sworn officers of the Government in South Carolina.

The presumption which existed against their work has been completely overthrown, and a strong counter-presumption has been created by the verification upon the ground of the schedules of inhabitants in the case of eighteen enumeration districts successively taken for special investigation on account of their exceptionally questionable character.

One further objection which has been brought against the reasonableness of the result of the census of 1880 in South Carolina deserves a brief notice.

That objection is derived from a comparison of the ratio of increase between 1820 and 1860 and that between 1860 and 1880. The population of South Carolina increased from 502,741 in 1820 to 703,708 in 1860, a gain of 40 per cent. in forty years. Between 1860 and 1880 the increase was from 703,708 to 995,006, a gain of 41 per cent. in twenty years. Such a comparison, however, is not fair, without reference to certain general causes operating during the two periods.

From 1820 to 1860 South Carolina was a bee-hive, from which swarms were continually going forth to populate the newer cotton-growing States of the Southwest. Between 1820 and 1830 immense tracts of fertile lands belonging to the Creeks and Cherokees in Georgia were ceded to the United States, and were largely occupied by South Carolinians. Later in the period an active emigration of whites from South Carolina sprang up and was maintained in favor of Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana, while South Carolina negroes were sold in great numbers to cultivate the cotton, rice, and sugar fields of those States. Still later the annexation of Texas made further drafts upon the population of South Carolina.

| Number of persons born in South Carolina living in that State in 1870 | 678,708 |
| Number of persons born in South Carolina, but living in other States of the Union in 1870 | 246,066 |

From which it appears that South Carolina had given to other States nearly 27 per cent. of her entire native stock.

| Of these there were living in Georgia | 54,937 |
| In Mississippi | 35,956 |
| In Florida | 22,116 |
| In Texas | 17,717 |
| In Arkansas | 13,807 |

It is probable that these figures underrate the facts so far as the negro element is concerned, since it seems most likely that many negroes who were born in South Carolina, but who had been sent ten, twenty, or thirty years before 1870 to other States, would be returned as born in the States in which they were then found, the tradition of their origin being lost.

We do not know fully what effects the destruction of slavery and the vast change resulting in the conditions of labor have produced upon the emigrating propensities of the people of South Carolina. We do know that negroes are no longer sold South to cultivate the lands of the Yazoo, the Red River, and the Brazos. It is reasonable to suppose that concurring causes may have checked in an equal degree the outward movement of the white population. A comparison of the "free" natives of South Carolina living in other States in 1860 with the white natives of South Carolina living in such States in 1870 shows their numbers to have been respectively 193,389 and 148,574, a reduction of 45,000 in the ten years between 1860 and 1870.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

FRANCIS A. WALKER,
Superintendent of Census.

Hon. ALONZO BELL, Acting Secretary of the Interior.

It will be observed, Mr. President, that General Walker states his side of the case in the best possible temper, and with entire impartiality, giving to every ground of suspicion the fullest consideration.

To any fair-minded, honorable man it would seem that this candid explanation should have disarmed adverse criticism and deserved an honorable withdrawal of every charge of fraud against his work; but such is not the case, and the Government has been subjected to the expense and General Walker to the trouble and annoyance of dispatching Colonel Butterfield for further investigation and report, and I shall attach his report as an appendix to my remarks. It will be found to be confirmatory of what appears in the foregoing letter.

In regard to the census of 1870 and the machinery under which it was taken General Walker is not content with his own testimony, but brings his predecessor to court and he characterizes the whole business "as clumsy, antiquated, and barbarous," that "the machinery it provides is as unfit for use in the census of the United States in this day of advanced statistical science, as the smooth-bore, muzzle-loading Queen's arm of the Revolution, would be for service against the repeating-rifle of the present time." It answered its purpose at the time it was put in operation, as did the "smooth bore," but it belongs to a by-gone age. The world has moved, and had moved in 1870, and yet some of the republican Senators and stump orators of that time permitted a fraud to be perpetrated upon the country under "its clumsy, antiquated, barbarous," "machinery," and now in advance, and without investigation or a hearing denounce the work of the tenth census because forsooth, "southern Senators and members of the House selected the enumerators." I am prepared to take my share of the responsibility for the selections. The Superintendent of the Census will bear me out in the assertion that as far as I could control it I would consent to the confirmation of no man, democrat or republican, whose character was not a guarantee to a faithful, honest performance of his duty. I asked for the appointment of no friend or partisan because he was a friend or partisan. I tried to secure the appointment of those only who would do their duty irrespective of party or party interests, and I believe I know only such were appointed and confirmed for South Carolina. And, Mr. President, it will require something more than the sneers and snarls of charlatans, and carpings of disappointed malcontents, to drive me from the good opinion I have of the work on the tenth census in that State. Those intrusted with the work do not belong to that breed of cormorants foisted upon her and sustained by the malevolence and hatred of some of those republican patriots of 1870 who now challenge the efforts and misrepresent the motives of those of us who strive to rescue her from the palsying, paralyzing touch of their vulgar henchman.

No, Mr. President, there has been no fraud in the enumeration of the inhabitants of South Carolina. The census has been taken with fidelity, and the proof is conclusive, overwhelming, and yet the author of the charge has not the sense of justice to withdraw it, to make honorable amends for a gross misrepresentation. A presidential election was pending, and perversion, prejudice, and injustice were more efficacious for the purposes in hand than truth and justice, and right recklessly were they wielded. They served their purpose, but the traducer of my State and her people shall not escape exposure. The result of that enumeration has converted many confidant predictions of partisan politicians as to the drift of political power into dismal fallacies. It has baffled the calculations and clouded the hopes of so many who hate the South and foretold her decadence that perhaps some allowances should be made for their bad temper and reckless accusations. Not content with criminal participation in despoiling the South by commissioning for that special service a band of greedy vampires, and sustaining them while they plied their insatiate avocation, after she is plundered and bled to depletion, the chief rallier of that band of spoliators depreciates her because of her poverty, and upbraids her for her humiliated attitude. Why, Mr. President, when the professional highwayman or outlaw overcomes and robs the helpless wayfarer he, even, is too magnanimous to insult his victim by hurling at him vulgar anathemas and bitter curses.

Let this political highwayman go learn humanity and magnanimity from the reckless outcast, and shelter his ignominy from the hissing storm of scorn and contumely. The lesson, Mr. President, which this last census teaches is an instructive one. It deserves to be prayerfully studied by those who have spent anxious hours "arguing out" the "steady decline" and "stagnation" of the South.

The little State which I have the honor in part to represent, of 34,000 square miles, has lost within the last two decades not less and perhaps more than three hundred and fifty million dollars, actual cash values, lost to her as completely and effectually as if sunk to the bottom of mid-ocean. Within that time she has also had reconstruction, the ninth census, the reign of the carpet-bagger, and missionaries from the Northern Methodist Church and her own mistakes, blessings enough to have translated her to the happy confines of elysian fields or to the sublimated heights of Plymouth Rock self-complacency, or curses enough, as these visitations may be regarded from the different stand-points, to have consigned her to the ninth circle of Dante's Inferno. Whether they have been blessings or curses, she has bravely survived them, and, as best she may, is wrestling with the grave problem of race issues and social incongruities, hoping to master them upon principles of a broad humanity and with a triumph of law and social order.

She has no complaint to utter save against those who traduce and vilify her, and to those she returns the salutation of scornful contempt.

Four years ago, when she rescued her government from the hands of the spoliator, she gathered up her credit, being hawked about and spit upon in the market places, a by-word and a reproach, and to-day her securities are commanding from 6 to 10 per cent. premium on their par value.

She has the frame-work of a public-school system that, under the encouragement of a wise and judicious management, is being annually and steadily developed into an educational asylum for all her children, and needs only time and money and judgment to be made equal to any in the American Union. The improvement in her homestead laws is fixing her population permanently upon her soil, and she is no longer a nursery for her younger sisters of the West and Northwest. Under the operation and protection of equal laws, justly executed, a system of land tenantry is being changed to one of land tenure, and life and property are safely guarded. She has increased the product of her principal staple 130 per cent. in ten years, namely, in the last five and this year it is estimated at 516,000 bales against 226,000 in 1870. Her manufactories have more than doubled in capacity, as the following table will show:

| Looms | 1,776 | 745 | 138 |
| Spindles | 92,788 | 34,940 | 166 |
| Bales used | 33,099 | 9,514 | 248 |
| Hands employed | 2,195 | 1,123 | 96 |

And within the last thirty days the capital stock of one cotton-mill of $400,000 has been subscribed in home capital at Charleston, and another is being rapidly organized at the same place in the same way. She exempts from taxation for ten years all new manufacturing establishments, and of the property of immigrants she exempts for three years $1,500, the amount of her homestead exemption. Her mineral resources have quadrupled in development, and yet are comparatively untouched. Her people are still poor, but they have $100 in cash now, saved under the benign influences of honest government and home rule, where they had $10 under the harrowing perplexities and legalized robbery of misrule and dishonest government. Her population has steadily increased—greatly increased. Just how much, thanks to the faultless census of 1870, "taken by republican marshals and their deputies," nobody can tell with accuracy.

These are some things, Mr. President, that do not indicate "stagnation" or a "steady decline," and I have adverted to them to show to the country how entirely unreliable are the statements of partisan non-reformers, who recklessly resort to calumny against whole communities and peoples to effectuate an unholy purpose. As I have said, the people of the South are poor—comparatively poor—but it is no disgrace, and they are not ashamed of it; but it ill becomes the criminal receiver of their stolen goods, one who has waxed fat upon their misfortunes, to chide them with their poverty.

Rebellion, revolution, war, have their lessons as well as revenges. They are merciless, they are cruel, they are destructive, and the Southern people know what they mean. Their wounds are cicatrizing, and the graves of the dead past are sodded with a respectful oblivion, and would rest in peace on through the ages but for the political hyenas who dig into those graves and munch the bones and growl over the dead forms of the passions that are buried.

The South, Mr. President, is deeply interested in whatever concerns the people of the whole country; deeply interested in the development of the resources of the country, and in maintaining the honor and credit and dignity of the Government.

I believe the forthcoming report of the Superintendent of the Census will contain the most valuable and complete repository of information that has ever been collected in this country, and will illustrate a proficiency and advancement in statistical science by the distinguished and accomplished head of the bureau that will place him abreast of the leading scientists of the world.

His work will show some curious facts—I might almost say caprices—in the movements of populations and the drift of political power. The center of population has moved westwardly from New York since 1800, along the thirty-ninth parallel of latitude, deflecting north or south as the population would drift north or south, and in 1870 it lodged about forty-two miles northeast of Cincinnati, Ohio. The census of 1880 will draw the center south of Cincinnati and south of the Ohio River. Such at least are the indications at the present stage of information.

The following geographical grouping of States, showing the difference in population in 1870 and 1880, and the per cent. of increase in each group, is suggestive as to the tendency of political power in this country, and I shall insert it here for consideration:

Group 1—Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania.

| Population in 1870 | 12,298,730 |
| Population in 1880 | 14,508,017 |
| Increase during decade | 2,209,287=15¼ per cent. |

Group 2—Maryland, Delaware, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, West Virginia, Tennessee, Kentucky, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Missouri.

| Population in 1870 | 13,877,615 |
| Population in 1880 | 18,504,205 |
| Increase during decade | 4,626,590=25 per cent. |

Group 3—Louisiana, Mississippi, Kentucky, Tennessee, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, Arkansas.

| Population in 1870 | 11,568,421 |
| Population in 1880 | 15,033,909 |
| Increase during decade | 3,465,488=23.1 per cent. |

Group 4—Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin.

| Population in 1870 | 9,124,517 |
| Population in 1880 | 11,207,181 |
| Increase during decade | 2,082,664=18.6 per cent. |

Group 5—Nebraska, Kansas, Colorado, Nevada, Oregon, California.

| Population in 1870 | 1,220,917 |
| Population in 1880 | 2,744,766 |
| Increase during decade | 1,523,849=55.1 per cent. |

Group of "Cotton States," showing the increase of population and percentage of increase during the decade 1870-1880—North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Tennessee.

| Population in 1870 | 8,074,475 |
| Population in 1880 | 11,206,807 |
| Increase during decade | 3,132,332=27.95 per cent. |

The first group is composed of the New England States and of the States of New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, and they show an increase of population in the decade of only 15¼ per cent.

The second is composed of the former slave States, and they show an increase of 25 per cent. It would be difficult to judge accurately of the increase in these States as the census of 1870, in at least one of them, has been shown to have been unreliable, but perhaps a deduction of 1 per cent. on the whole would equalize the actual increase.

The third group is composed of the States lying on both sides the Mississippi River from its mouth to its source, and is the Mississippi Valley proper. They show an increase of 23.1 per cent.

The fourth group is composed of the five great States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin, and show an increase of only 18.6 per cent.

The fifth group are the Western States proper, exclusive of Texas, and they show the immense increase of 55.1 per cent.

And the sixth group is composed of the cotton States, showing an increase of 27.95 per cent.—nearly 28.

These several groups are merely arbitrary, but they show that "the scepter hath departed from Judah;" and the poetic expression that "Westward the course of empire takes its way" is not a flight of fancy but a stern reality.

The "star of the South" has been shrouded by the cloud of slavery for two centuries, but as it rises and warms with the effulgence of freedom, it will mingle its rays brightly among the brightest in the constellation of States. The growing confidence of the people of the South in their ability to keep step to the music of free institutions in this Republic will vitalize their energies and give point to their efforts in the race for power.

This whole country is beginning an era of unrivaled prosperity and development, and if the powers of Government and forces of society are held with a steady, considerate hand, the eleventh census will reveal a degree of healthful progress never dreamed of by the most ardent believer in the capacity of republican institutions for the promotion of human happiness.

Relieved of the incubus of slavery, that bête noir of the past, and left free to rehabilitate herself upon terms of equality with other States of the Union and regulate her domestic concerns in her own way so as to secure and maintain law and order, and the peace and happiness of her whole people, the South will realize a marvelous increase in wealth and prosperity.

And, Mr. President, I believe all good men of all parties and sections will sincerely rejoice if this prediction shall prove true. The jaundiced partisan who nurses "envy, hatred, and malice," and practices "all uncharitableness," will find himself the gloomy, isolated apostle of hate, breathing harmless and helpless discords into the grand harmonies of the Republic, reunited in heart and purpose as well as in form.

APPENDIX.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 25, 1881.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following report of the results of the re-enumeration of certain townships in the State of South Carolina, made by special agents under my charge, for the purpose of testing the accuracy of the census of that State taken in the month of June, 1880.

In compliance with your instructions, I left Washington for Columbia, South Carolina, on the 19th of November, 1880. Previous to my departure, Messrs. J. B. Burt, O. P. D. Stone, J. B. Isler, and T. Quinn reported to me for duty, and accompanied me to South Carolina.

I reached Columbia on the evening of the 20th, and at once put myself in communication with Mr. E. W. Brayton, collector of internal revenue, and Colonel R. M. Wallace, United States marshal of South Carolina. Collector Brayton very kindly furnished me with an office in the United States court-house, and promptly volunteered everything in the way of information, accommodation, and assistance which I might require.

On the following day Colonel Wallace arrived from Charleston.

Under your instructions eight townships were to be selected for re-enumeration by Colonel Wallace. On his recommendation the following were chosen for that purpose: Due West, Abbeville County; No. 8, Fairfield County; Waterloo, Laurens County; Williston, Barnwell County; Broad River, Lexington County; Steerpen, Chesterfield County; Cains, Marion County; Johnson, Williamsburgh County.

In the selection of these townships several points were taken into consideration:

1. The extraordinary gains reported in them during the last decade.

2. By those best acquainted with the townships in question, no satisfactory theory accounting for such gains could be devised.

3. These townships were widely scattered throughout the State, and only one taken from a county; and lastly they were all in other counties than those examined during a previous investigation, conducted by Mr. Gannett, of your office.

It will also be observed that these townships compose a portion of each of the three supervisors' districts of South Carolina.

The following table shows the population of these townships in 1870 and 1880, and the extraordinary gains reported in them:

| Townships. | 1870. | 1880. | Increase. | Per cent. |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| First supervisor's district: | | | | |
| Due West, Abbeville County | 1,030 | 2,457 | 1,427 | 139 |
| No. 8, Fairfield County | 1,562 | 2,559 | 997 | 64 |
| Waterloo, Laurens County | 2,158 | 4,018 | 1,860 | 86 |
| Second supervisor's district: | | | | |
| Williston, Barnwell County | 1,379 | 2,669 | 1,290 | 94 |
| Broad River, Lexington County | 1,116 | 2,426 | 1,310 | 117 |
| Third supervisor's district: | | | | |
| Steerpen, Chesterfield County | 545 | 2,080 | 1,535 | 282 |
| Cains, Marion County | 1,007 | 2,405 | 1,398 | 139 |
| Johnson, Williamsburgh County | 1,218 | 2,397 | 1,179 | 97 |
| Total | 10,015 | 21,011 | 10,996 | |
| Average per cent. of increase | | | | 127 |

The designation of these townships being made, the force under my charge were at once sent to their respective places of operation.

I assigned to Major J. B. Burt, Broad River and No. 8; to Mr. O. P. D. Stone, Steerpen and Cains; to Captain J. B. Isler, Williston and Johnson; and to Colonel Timothy Quinn, Due West and Waterloo.

Instructions were given to each one of these gentlemen to collect the following data:

First. Description and location of house.
Second. Names of the inhabitants.
Third. Color.
Fourth. Sex.
Fifth. Age (and in case of children less than one year old the number of months to be given.)
Sixth. Avocation of heads of families.
The re-enumeration to be of present date.

They were particularly enjoined to find and visit every house in the townships canvassed. To this end they were instructed, whenever necessary, to provide themselves with horses and guides well acquainted with the localities, as in the country the houses are very much scattered, being away from the main roads, in the woods, and on bridle-paths. Also, as the boundaries of townships are in many cases merely arbitrary lines, to exercise the greatest care in following them.

Immediately on my arrival in Columbia, I had communicated with the three supervisors of census, asking them to fix a time and place at which I might meet each of them. In response to a telegram from Major Harry Hammond, supervisor of the second district, I met him on the 28th of November at Augusta, Georgia, which is near his place of residence. Major Hammond met me with the greatest courtesy, and at once proffered me every assistance in his power to facilitate my investigations. By letters to the enumerators and leading men in the township, he rendered efficient aid to the special agents assigned to his district.

Receiving a telegram from Hon. J. L. Breeden, supervisor of the third district, offering to meet me at any point I might designate, and tendering his services in any way which I desired, I took the liberty to ask him to meet Mr. Stone at Cheraw, near Mr. Breeden's home, and give him such information and assistance as he might require, to which he cheerfully responded, and rendered valuable assistance to the gentlemen sent to his district.

Soon after my return from Augusta, Colonel Pride, supervisor of the first district, called upon me in Columbia, remaining in the city several days. Colonel Pride placed at my disposal all the records in his supervisor's office, and very kindly did everything in his power to facilitate the work in his district.

On the 8th of December the canvass of the first township was completed, others following at intervals, the last being finished on the 7th of January.

Upon the receipt of the results of the field-work, I proceeded in private to make the necessary comparisons between the re-enumeration and the June schedules, which, in the mean time, I had received from your office.

The following table will show the aggregates of the two enumerations, and an increase since June, 1880:

| Locality. | June enumeration. | Re-enumeration. | Increase since June. |
|---|---|---|---|
| Due West | 2,457 | 2,576 | 119 |
| No. 8 | 2,559 | 2,685 | 126 |
| Waterloo | 4,018 | 4,150 | 132 |
| Williston | 2,669 | 2,723 | 54 |
| Broad River | 2,426 | 2,441 | 15 |
| Steerpen | 2,080 | 2,090 | 10 |
| Cains | 2,405 | 2,480 | 75 |
| Johnson | 2,397 | 2,463 | 66 |
| Total | 21,011 | 21,608 | 597 |

The following table will show the results of the comparisons:

| Locality. | June enumeration. | Re-enumeration. | Increase since June. | Names common to both schedules. | Names on June schedule not found by re-enumeration. | Names found by re-enumeration not on June schedule. |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Due West | 2,457 | 2,576 | 119 | 2,215 | 242 | 361 |
| No. 8 | 2,559 | 2,685 | 126 | 2,320 | 239 | 365 |
| Waterloo | 4,018 | 4,150 | 132 | 3,673 | 345 | 477 |
| Williston | 2,669 | 2,723 | 54 | 2,394 | 275 | 329 |
| Broad River | 2,426 | 2,441 | 15 | 2,158 | 268 | 283 |
| Steerpen | 2,080 | 2,090 | 10 | 1,942 | 138 | 148 |
| Cains | 2,465 | 2,480 | 75 | 2,232 | 173 | 248 |
| Johnson | 2,397 | 2,463 | 66 | 2,152 | 245 | 311 |

It follows from an examination of these tables the gain since June is 597, or nearly 2¾ per cent.; also nearly 91 per cent. of the names on the June schedules were found by the special agents still living in their respective townships. I think I am justified in accounting for the large gain since June from two causes:

First. The legitimate increase from natural causes, that is, excess of births over deaths. It appears from the schedules of re-enumeration that the births since June, 1880, are 436, which is something over 2 per cent. of the population reported in June, and this for the six months intervening between the two enumerations. This is somewhat above the percentage usually conceded to be an average by compilers of statistics on this subject.

Second. It is to be expected that special agents, selected for their known capacity and experience in census work, would make a more thorough and exhaustive enumeration than gentlemen to whom the work was entirely new, no matter how strict their integrity and honest their intentions.

Especially would this be true since the special agents were instructed to procure the best attainable guides, maps, and all the available helps to make their work complete; furthermore, in most cases in the work of recanvassing the townships, by the courtesy of the officers connected with the June enumeration, the enumerators accompanied the special agents, who thus had the advantage of their own experience and that of the enumerators.

It must therefore be plainly probable that a considerable number of persons are included in the re-enumeration who were overlooked in June.

As above stated, nearly 91 per cent. of the names are common to both schedules, leaving a fraction over 9 per cent., or 1,925 names, which I was unable to verify. This number is divided among the white and colored population as follows:

| Locality. | White. | Colored. | Total. |
|---|---|---|---|
| Due West | 109 | 133 | 242 |
| No. 8 | 80 | 159 | 239 |
| Waterloo | 109 | 236 | 345 |
| Williston | 82 | 193 | 275 |
| Broad River | 93 | 175 | 268 |
| Steerpen | 80 | 58 | 138 |
| Cains | 90 | 83 | 173 |
| Johnson | 82 | 163 | 245 |
| Total | 725 | 1,200 | 1,925 |

The failure to verify this number may be attributed to the ordinary movement of population in part, but largely to the well-known custom among the colored population of a frequent change of name. As regards the movement of population, several circumstances unite to form an explanation why in this case it should be large.

In several of these townships are turpentine distilleries, the laborers in which are mainly composed of what may be termed "floating population."

Between the two enumerations occurred the season of cotton-picking, which in a cotton-growing locality invariably occasions considerable changing about of laborers and their families.

In one of the townships, Due West, are located three quite extensive educational institutions, the students in which were included in each enumeration.

In that township I find on the June schedules the names of 43 students, all white, which could not be verified. It is a well-known fact that in all such institutions, to a certain degree, changes are continually taking place.

By reference to the foregoing table it will be seen that this number comprises nearly one-half the white population not verified in that township.

Near another of the townships is a cotton factory, which the special agent assigned to that locality assures me had no inconsiderable influence in producing movement of population.

How materially the frequent change of names among the colored race increased the difficulty of the verification is strikingly illustrated by a subsequent critical examination made in the township of Johnson, where, by the aid of the June schedules, one hundred and fifty-one additional names were verified, of which one hundred and thirty were of colored people.

Taking all the facts into consideration, I feel justified in saying that 91 per cent. is a very close verification.

Having arrived at the above results, acting under your instructions, I selected the township of Johnson, in which to make a still more searching test of the correctness of the previous enumeration.

Accordingly I prepared a transcript of the names appearing on the June schedules for that township, not verified, and dispatched Captain J. B. Isler to that place with directions to institute a strict inquiry for the parties bearing those names to verify their existence or non-existence on the 1st day of June, 1880, by sworn testimony from respectable citizens.

In this matter I was very materially aided by Major Harry Noah, of the internal revenue service, who is secretary of the State republican committee, who kindly gave Captain Isler letters to the chairman of the county republican committee and other leading republicans in the county. I also communicated with Colonel Wallace in regard to the matter, and am able to say that the parties making the affidavits which accompany this report are fully indorsed as being honorable men and entitled to the fullest confidence.

The result of Captain Isler's efforts fully justified my expectations. By the aid of the transcript from the June schedules, he was able, out of a list of two hundred and forty-five, to verify one hundred and fifty-one additional names, leaving ninety-four still to be accounted for.

Herewith you will find affidavits, in proper and legal form, showing that of the ninety-four not found by the re-enumeration, eighty have removed from the township and thirteen have died since June 1, 1880. This leaves a discrepancy of one, in explanation of which I have to say that one name is duplicated on the June schedule, so that in the township of Johnson every name which appears on the June schedule is exactly accounted for.

I believe if time would have permitted, the same result could have been reached in each of the other seven townships.

Having completed the work assigned me, I returned to Washington, arriving on the evening of January 16.

My investigation of the census of South Carolina has led me to the conclusion that it was correctly taken. I have discovered no trace or indication of fraud whatever, and far from being a corrupt census, I firmly believe it to have been taken carefully and honestly.

In conclusion, I desire to say that I was received and treated with uniform courtesy and kindness by the people of South Carolina. Every facility was afforded me for the prosecution of the investigation. Particularly did those connected with the June enumeration cheerfully render their assistance, both to myself and the special agents associated with me, whenever circumstances made it possible to do so.

From Colonel R. M. Wallace, United States marshal; Mr. E. W. Brayton, collector of internal revenue; and Major Harry Noah, secretary State republican committee, my force and myself received many favors and valuable assistance.

The gentlemen detailed to assist in this work as special agents have done their duty with promptitude and fidelity, and merit my hearty commendation.

Trusting that this work may prove to have been satisfactorily done, I am,

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I infer from the little I have heard from the Senator from South Carolina—and it is very little, owing to being most of the time engaged otherwise—that his utterance is designed as an assault on me. For the vaporings of the Senator from South Carolina, I have no concern. He has alluded to a speech made by me in New York in September last; he has taken now about five months to reply to that speech.

Having had no notice or knowledge that the Senator meditated any reference to me, and having been unable to hear much of what he has read from his apparently carefully concocted manuscript, I will take at least until to-morrow or some other morning when I may find time to read in the RECORD whatever he may be pleased to publish. Should I find that he publishes anything requiring of me personally or as one of the representatives of the State of New York any comment, I will make it. Meanwhile I dismiss the matter with the remark, that whenever satisfied that I have in any manner done injustice to the State of South Carolina, to the people of South Carolina, to any other State, to any other community, to any individual, I shall seek a seasonable and suitable occasion to recall and as far as possible correct my error.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, the Senator from New York may rest assured that whatever I have uttered will appear in the RECORD to-morrow morning. He says that the vaporings of the Senator from South Carolina are matters of no concern to him. He will pardon me for saying that the swaggering insolence of the Senator from New York is of no concern to me.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I need not have heard the Senator from South Carolina in order to ascertain that he is a person with whom I do not choose to bandy epithets here or anywhere, least of all here; and therefore I have nothing to add to that which I have before said.

MEXICAN AWARDS.

Mr. EATON. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, whether any objection has been made by this Government to suits being brought in the courts of the United States by the Government of Mexico against American citizens, and if such objection has been made, to communicate to the Senate the diplomatic correspondence, if any, in relation thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. VOORHEES. Let it be printed and go over until to-morrow. There will be no desire for delay.

Mr. EATON. I ask that it be printed and laid on the table if it must go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

The bill (H. R. No. 554) for the relief of David W. Stockstill—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. No. 4434) for the relief of Mrs. Martha Bridges, of Bartow County, Georgia—to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (H. R. No. 2844) for the relief of James E. Montell—to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. No. 4437) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Pierre Joseph Mais—to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The bill (H. R. No. 4438) for the relief of William Redus—to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (H. R. No. 7036) to establish post-routes—to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

COMMITTEE ON POST-OFFICES AND POST-ROADS.

Mr. HAMLIN. With the concurrence and approval of the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, I ask the Senate to give its leave to that committee to sit during the session of the Senate to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.) The Senator from Maine asks that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be allowed to sit during the session of the Senate to-day. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that leave is granted.

THE LIBRARY.

Mr. VOORHEES. I wish to ask the attention of the Senate for one moment to the order of business. There is an extremely important bill on the Calendar, reported from the joint select committee on the consideration of additional accommodations for the Library of Congress. I have not sought to antagonize the appropriation bills, nor do I wish to do so; but I give notice that as soon as the present appropriation bill for pensions is concluded, I will then ask the Senate to take up and consider the bill which I have indicated. It is a bill of the very greatest importance, but at the same time I feel convinced that it will not occupy any considerable length of time. It is one of those questions that we must meet. When the appropriation bill in charge of the Senator from California [Mr. BOOTH] is concluded, I shall ask the Senate to take the course indicated by me.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BOOTH. Mr. President, I ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed by the Secretary that the unfinished business is the bill (S. No. 1210) for the relief of certain officers of the Navy.

Mr. CONKLING. That was the unfinished business on Saturday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that is now the unfinished business.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think that bill was taken up under an order of the Senate postponing the prior order until to-day.

Mr. FARLEY. We can finish it to-day.

Mr. McMILLAN. I should like to inquire whether that order does not——

Mr. CONKLING. The honorable Senator will pardon me. Such a motion as that would not be in order under the rules of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Indian severalty bill by vote of the Senate was postponed until Monday and thereby lost its place as unfinished business.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Chair be kind enough to repeat his statement?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Indian severalty bill was postponed by vote of the Senate on Saturday last until Monday, and thereby lost its place as unfinished business.

Mr. CONKLING. That is the rule undoubtedly; and then the pending bill, as the unfinished business, is the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. EATON. I ask the Chair if the pending bill is not the bill which was under discussion when the Senate adjourned and the Senator from New Hampshire was in the middle of a speech. I submit that that bill ought to be taken up now to give my friend from New Hampshire the opportunity to close his remarks.

Mr. BOOTH. I ask unanimous consent that the pending order, whatever it may be, be laid aside informally in order to proceed with the consideration of the pension appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California asks unanimous consent of the Senate that the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. No. 1210) for the relief of certain officers of the Navy, be laid aside temporarily and without prejudice, in order that the pension appropriation bill may be taken up. Is there objection?

Mr. FARLEY. I dislike to antagonize my colleague; but in view of the fact that the appropriation bill can come up immediately after this bill, I think we should go on with it. I shall not press the objection.

Mr. WINDOM. I believe the pension bill is now before the Senate by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not yet. There being no objection to the proposition of the Senator from California, the pension appropriation bill will now be taken up. It is before the Senate.

Mr. WINDOM. I only want to say a word or two to call the attention of the Senate to the question before it. If I am not mistaken the question is upon the point of order raised as to whether the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. WITHERS] is in order. Now, it does seem to me that the Senate can save a great deal of time by deciding that question. We have already discussed the amendment two or three days, and the discussion will probably run two or three days more, when I think if the Senate will decide according to the rule it will hold the amendment out of order, when all the discussion will have passed for nothing. It seems to me if the Senate could be induced to act upon the question, or to confine the discussion to the question of order, it would save a great deal of time. I shall insist, I think, if the discussion goes on, that it shall be confined to the question.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Mr. President, when this bill was up on Saturday, I took the floor to reply, as I might, to the argument made by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] but yielded at the request of Senators, as the hour was late, that other business might be done. I will say to the Senator from Minnesota that I do not see how he can save any time by insisting on confining the debate to the question of order.

Mr. WINDOM. I will answer the Senator, if he will permit me. If the amendment be ruled out of order, there will be nothing of that kind before the Senate.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. But how do you stop discussion? As I said on Saturday, if the amendment is ruled out of order the pension bill proper remains, and that is open to discussion.

Mr. WINDOM. I am quite sure that nobody will want to discuss this general question upon the simple proposition of the bill that we shall appropriate money to pay the pensions.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I have often been very sure of matters in which I have found myself very much mistaken.

Mr. WINDOM. I am relying very much on the disposition of the Senate to complete its business by the 4th of March. If I am mistaken in that, then the Senator from Iowa is doubtless right.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I am satisfied that the Committee on Pensions, who have spent considerable time in the preparation of this bill, will be unwilling, after it has been so strongly opposed and upon the grounds of opposition offered to it here, to let the matter go over until their side of the question has been presented to the Senate.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I rise to a question of order. What is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is, Is the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. WITHERS] to the pension appropriation bill in order?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I understood that the Senator from California [Mr. FARLEY] had given way simply for the purpose of letting this matter be put in a position to be heard after his bill was considered, and not to go into general debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not so understand.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If I understand the condition of the question, it is simply a question of order; the merits of the bill are not before the Senate at all; the question is, Is the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia in order at this stage of the bill? That is the question, and we have been discussing the merits of the bill for two or three days.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Iowa kindly allows me to say a word. The pending question is whether the amendment to the pension appropriation bill providing for a local examination is in order. Upon that the Senator from Iowa is addressing the Senate. He thinks it right when that question is pending to proceed to consider what would be the effect of such a measure, if it were in order or if it were not, whichever way his opinion may be. Now, I wish to say so that everybody can hear me that in the fifteen years I have been in the Senate whenever these questions have come up in this way, it has been always decided, sometimes on appeal and by yeas and nays so that it is settled, that every Senator must be the judge for himself as to the relevancy of the remarks he is making about anything, and on the whole it has been found that it is better for liberty and courtesy and fair play all around in a small body like this that it should be so.

Mr. FARLEY. Do I understand that the proposition is to consider this amendment now instead of going on with the unfinished business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator from California on the right [Mr. FARLEY] to assent to the proposition made by his colleague [Mr. BOOTH] that the regular order, which is the bill which was under discussion when the Senate adjourned on Saturday last, be temporarily laid aside, without prejudice, for the purpose of taking up the pension appropriation bill.

Mr. FARLEY. For the purpose of allowing that bill to have its place, as I understood, and be considered immediately after the unfinished business was concluded. That was my intention.

Mr. ALLISON. Now the Senator from California will allow me a moment. There is an appropriation bill pending under consideration. The bill of the Senator from California will be the regular order the moment that bill is disposed of.

Mr. FARLEY. But the unfinished business was the naval bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. FARLEY. And the Senator from New Hampshire was addressing the Senate, and in the midst of his speech when the Senate adjourned. Under the rules of the Senate that bill is entitled first to consideration to-day.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly; but any Senator can move to lay aside the bill, and it is a universal custom to lay aside such measures for appropriation bills.

Mr. FARLEY. Not always.

Mr. ALLISON. Always.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I ask if in the midst of debate on a pending measure it is usual to ask a Senator to suspend his argument in order to take up an appropriation bill?

Mr. ALLISON. It is not proper to take a gentleman off the floor, of course.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The Senator from New Hampshire was on the floor at the adjournment on Saturday.

Mr. ALLISON. But he has slept over Sunday on it. I desire to appeal to the Senator from California to allow this appropriation bill to go on.

Mr. FARLEY. But it will take all day to-day.

Mr. ALLISON. So be it; but the Senator's bill is now the regular order.

Mr. FARLEY. Well, go on.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Am I in order, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa is in order.

Mr. FARLEY. The understanding is that the unfinished business retains its place after this bill is over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the understanding.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 939) to amend the law relative to the seizure and forfeiture of vessels for breach of the revenue laws.

The message also announced that the House had appointed Mr. JOHN F. HOUSE, of Tennessee, and Mr. RICHARD CROWLEY, of New York, tellers on the part of the House to count the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States on Wednesday, February 9, 1881.

AMENDMENT TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. MAXEY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 6972) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CALL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committe of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6532) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, the question being on the point of order raised by Mr. TELLER as to the reception of the amendment proposed by Mr. WITHERS.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I propose, Mr. President, as briefly as I may and as clearly as I may, to present to the attention of the Senate the present condition of the business in the Pension Office; what has caused that condition, as I understand it; the hardships it imposes upon applicants for pensions, and the benefits to those applicants to be derived from the amendment offered by the chairman of the Committee on Pensions.

What, then, is the present situation? There are now pending in the Pension Office in round numbers 300,000 pension claims. Of that number 282,000 or about that are original claims. The others are for increase of pension, widows' pensions and so on; but in round numbers there are 300,000 claims there pending, enough to require the continued labor of the present force in the Pension Office for ten years to settle them, if a single new claim should not be presented. That is the condition of affairs. Claims are pending there now that cannot be heard and determined short of ten years from this time, unless something be done. It is much more difficult now to dispose of claims than it was immediately after the close of the war. When claims were then presented they were based upon causes apparent because the existence of the disability could be proved in almost every case by Army records; scarcely anything was needed except proof of the identity of the claimant. But now after the lapse of sixteen years from the close of the war the case is wholly different; the classes of claims presented are wholly different; they require a much more careful and much more full investigation, and are much more difficult to prove. So we not only have this immense number of claims to dispose of, but we have the added difficulty in disposing of them by reason of the length of time which has elapsed since the close of the war and the causes for which claims are now presented.

This amounts to a denial of justice to applicants, it is an absolute denial to them of that justice which they have a right to demand at the hands of the American Government. We indulge in very eloquent language at times in regard to what is due to pensioners, what care should be taken of them; and yet it seems to me we cannot do them a greater wrong than to so manage any bureau established for the allowance of their pensions that they may, half of them, die before their claims can be heard. Justice, when it is not granted speedily, is substantially denied; and therefore the Commissioner of Pensions has pressed upon the attention of the Senate Committee on Pensions, and that committee for the last two years and more have been carefully considering to ascertain whether something cannot be done to remove these difficulties out of the way, and allow the men who are asking for their pensions and are entitled to them to have them.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] agrees with me that something should be done. He agrees with me that the present condition of affairs is a denial of justice.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator will allow me to say that I agree that if there was more force required Congress ought to give it; I mean force in the Pension Office by additional clerks, not additional machinery.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The Senator from Illinois, I repeat, agrees with me that something should be done, that the present condition of affairs is a denial of justice to pensioners, and the question then is, what shall be done, and how shall it be done? I understood the Senator in his remarks on Friday and Saturday to say that there were two things in the way of a speedy determination of these claims: first, that the Commissioner of Pensions was incompetent and unfit for his place; and second, that he had not force enough at his command to do the work if he were competent.

Now, Mr. President, I am not here as the special advocate of the Commissioner of Pensions. I never knew him or knew there was such a man until I became acquainted with him by my membership of the Committee on Pensions; but my membership of that committee for four years has brought me largely in contact with him, has led me, as was my duty, I think, to know as well as I am able to know whether or not he is fit for that place, and I feel myself bound in justice to him to say that I believe him to be a faithful, an honest, a competent, and an energetic officer, who is doing all that he can or that any man in his place can do to hear and determine these cases rapidly and speedily, and with as strong a desire as any other man can have that every one who is entitled to a pension shall have it. He has been about five years in the service. During that time he has decided more cases and more difficult cases than his predecessor, and the records of that office will show that during the three years, 1877, 1878, and 1879, the Pension Office has disposed of 57,339 cases, and that during the three years preceding that time that same office disposed of only 39,265 cases.

As I said before, year by year it becomes more difficult to determine what shall be done in the matter of applications for pensions.

When the pensioner applied for a pension because he had lost a leg or an arm, or because he had been discharged from the service having been discharged from the service by reason of disease, the question to be determined was an easy one; but now after ten, twelve, fourteen, or fifteen years have expired, when men come in and say they are suffering from disease contracted in the service, it becomes a very difficult question to determine whether or not that claim is a valid one; it becomes a very difficult matter for the applicant to prove that which he assigns for the cause of his application.

Not only has the present Commissioner done more work than his predecessor, but he has done it more cheaply. In 1874 it cost $28.62 to decide a pension claim; in 1875, $27.47; in 1876, $32.40. Under the present Commissioner it cost, in 1877, $25.41; in 1878, $20.55; and in 1879, $18.70 to decide a pension. So that he has not only done more work in the same time, but he has done more difficult work during that time, and he has done it more cheaply than his predecessor did. It may be that he is incompetent, but the evidence does not show it.

If, then, he is competent, is faithful, how does it come that the office is at this time blockaded and the business of allowing pensions is substantially suspended so far as a great many of the applicants are concerned? That is a pertinent question, a proper one. The reason, I apprehend, is easy to be found. We passed in 1879 what is called the arrears bill. I am not intending to-day to discuss the propriety or impropriety of the passage of that bill, but I desire to show the operation that bill has had upon the business of the Pension Office, in order to account, if that will account, for the obstruction of business now in it.

From the 25th day of January, 1879, to the 1st day of July, 1880, that is from the date of the passage of the arrears act until the 1st of July, 1880, one hundred and fifty-five thousand eight hundred and odd, or nearly one hundred and fifty-six thousand, claims were presented for allowance over and above the average presentation of claims that had occurred for years before that. In other words, if the presentation of claims had run along during that period of time as it had run along during the eighteen months preceding that time, there would have been 156,000 less claims in the Pension Office than there are to-day, so far as I can judge. At all events, the number of claims presented during that time exceeds by 156,000 the average that had been presented for eighteen months preceding that time.

More than that, some 20,000 claims that had been barred by existing law because the applicant had been unable to perfect his proof within five years, had been renewed by the removal of that bar by the arrears-of-pensions act.

With this immense mass of new applications thrown upon the Pension Bureau, it was not only reasonable that we should expect, but it was inevitable that it should be, to use a popular phrase, "snowed under" with its business, and that there should be cause of complaint on the part of men applying for pensions that their claims are unreasonably delayed in the hearing and determination.

Impressed with this view, the Committee on Pensions, as I before said, have labored assiduously for some two years past to devise some means by which this pending difficulty might be removed, by which the men who apply for pensions should have determined the question whether or not they are entitled to them, and if they are entitled to them, should have them allowed. That bill from its first presentation up to this time has been the subject of persistent misrepresentation and of very great misunderstanding. I remember perfectly well when the word was spread all through the State where I live, and where it is believed yet by many, that if that bill became a law every pensioner residing in any county of the State of Iowa who desired to prosecute a claim for a pension and had witnesses residing in Maine or California, would be compelled to bring the witnesses from Maine or California to the county where he lived in Iowa to have them examined before the examiner and surgeon provided for by the bill. That was spread broadcast over the country, was believed by many men to be so, and because it was believed and because it is yet believed, many men are utterly opposed to the proposed law, although it never did contemplate and does not contemplate any such thing.

Another thing that has been done to create prejudice against this bill is this: it has been persistently held up before the people of the country, and especially before the soldiers of the country, as a bill the primary purpose of which and almost the only purpose of which is to detect frauds as they are claimed to be upon the pension law. That is not the primary object of this bill; it is not the principle of this bill at all. The leading purpose of the bill is to provide some means by which the question whether a man is entitled to a pension or not can be speedily determined. The question of the detection of fraud is a mere incident. That fraudulent claims shall be allowed is inevitable in the nature of things. How large a proportion of the claims allowed are fraudulent I do not know, do not pretend to know; but as long as men are found dishonest enough to seek the payment to them of that which does not belong to them, and as long as agents can be found for them to press their claims, frauds will occur. They ought not to be encouraged.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to call his attention to the amendment I spoke of the other day on that point? I said those claims which had not yet been allowed would have to be examined under the machinery proposed in the amendment. It was mentioned a while ago that that was a mistake.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I have not come to that yet; I shall be at it soon. I was speaking of the allegation that witnesses would have to be brought from all parts of the United States to the county where the applicant lived.

Mr. LOGAN. Nobody said that.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The Senator from Illinois is widely mistaken. That was scattered broadcast all over this country years ago. I have received letter after letter from soldiers in my own State protesting to me against what they call that feature of the bill, and wondering why and how I could support a bill that contained any such provision.

An effort has been made to create the impression that the Commissioner of Pensions, and I suppose the Committee on Pensions as well, consider all applicants for pensions as perjurers, dishonest men, because the allegation has been made by the Commissioner, and because it has been shown to the committee that some fraudulent claims have been allowed where perjury has been committed. As a member of that committee I have passed through my hands as a sub-committee two claims, in one of which every important paper in the case was a forgery, and in another where the applicant himself was in the penitentiary when the claim was in my hands, for perjury and subornation of perjury in endeavoring to procure the allowance of the claim. It was so after the Mexican war; fraudulent claims were then pressed and were then allowed; fraudulent claims are now pressed and allowed, and they will be. You cannot avoid it until you can change human nature.

It is true, Mr. President, that while the great bulk of our Union soldiers were of the very best men that we had in the country, while that is peculiarly so of the soldiers raised in what we may call the rural districts of the country, yet many soldiers were raised in our large cities, some of whom were of a different class of men. We had at that time in some of our large cities men who were pursuing the very profitable industry of "bounty jumping;" enlisting to-day and taking the oath of allegiance to the Government as a soldier, getting the bounty, and deserting to-morrow, and the next day enlisting again and taking another bounty. We had them by scores and hundreds; I am afraid by thousands. A man who would engage in that kind of industry would not at all hesitate to engage in the procurement for himself, if he could, of an unlawful and fraudulent pension; and it is unfortunately true that in all the large cities men can be found who will press the allowance of such claims.

Mr. LOGAN. Does not the Senator know, however, that where an occurrence of that kind took place, the rolls of the War Department show the fact, and hence the man could not get a pension?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The Senator from Iowa does not know that, Mr. President. A man would enlist to-day as John Jones, jump his bounty, and enlist to-morrow or next day under another name, and a third time under another name, and a fourth time under another name, and the records of the War Department would show not that John Jones had enlisted three or four times successively, but that three or four different men had enlisted, and the records would not show the fraud.

But, as I was saying, the question of fraud is a mere incident of this bill. The great leading purpose of the bill is to have a speedy determination of the question whether the man who asks for a pension is entitled to it or not, and not make him delay year after year, year after year, and go down at last perhaps to his grave with a belief that the country he served so well has been unjust to him in refusing to give him that to which he is entitled. That is the purpose of the bill.

I now come to the point alluded to by the Senator from Illinois. I received a few days ago what I suppose to be a circular-letter, addressed by a firm in this city to myself, and I presume to other Senators, giving reasons why in the judgment of the writer this bill should not pass, and the first reason assigned is that if this bill shall pass then all, the proof now on file in the Pension Office in regard to claimants, whether that proof be complete as to particular claims or incomplete as to others—that all that proof is to go for nothing and, in the language of the circular addressed to me, these cases are to be commenced de novo. I deny it. There is not a word of truth in it. It never entered into the contemplation of the men who drew the bill, and who have studied it, I think, carefully, that any such result should follow.

Mr. LOGAN. Would not the papers where the application has not been allowed here be referred to that court?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Why, Mr. President, it seems to me that a man at all clear-headed in matters of business must understand what the result will be. If this amendment should become a law the first thing to be done in the Pension Office is to go through and assort, if I may so express myself, the claims there pending. It is supposed that about 25 per cent. of them are ready for final hearing, but they are scattered here and there by their number through the great mass of claims and are now as a rule reached in their regular order only. Therefore I say that if the bill shall pass as proposed to be amended the officers of the Pension Office will have to go to work and assort out from the mass those that are ready for hearing and lay them aside for present determination.

Mr. LOGAN. What will be done with the rest?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Then the pensioners' court, as the Senator from Illinois calls it, as I understand, will be furnished in each case with the points upon which additional testimony is required. Where testimony is on file establishing certain points needed to be established that evidence will stand, and this pensioners' court will be required to investigate, to procure, to furnish evidence upon points that are not covered by the testimony already on file.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator right there will allow me, I will show him exactly what I maintain, and I will give him the reasons for it by only calling his attention to the amendment. This is the language of the amendment, and if it does not sustain what I said then I misunderstand the English language:

All payments of pensions under this act of persons not on the pension-roll at the time of the passage of this act shall be made as far as may be practicable under the provisions hereinafter contained.

This is in the first section of the bill, that the pensions not allowed must be allowed under this machinery. That is exactly the language of it.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The Senator from Illinois speaks of an amendment of which I know nothing.

Mr. LOGAN. I addressed myself to the amendment which was offered to the amendment after the original amendment was submitted. The amendment to the amendment was offered by the Senator who submitted the amendment as a part of the amendment, and it was read at the Secretary's desk; it is fastened to the amendment and is to be discussed in reference to it.

Mr. CONKLING. It is pending now.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly it is, and is a part of the amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. And must be voted upon.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. That is, it is offered as an amendment to the amendment, which is the bill as it was reported from the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly, that is what I said.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. But the Senator ought not to characterize as part of the bill an amendment offered to it by an individual Senator.

Mr. LOGAN. It was offered by the chairman of the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WITHERS. Not as a representative of the committee at all; but without authority from the committee.

Mr. LOGAN. It makes no difference; it is now pending before the Senate the same as any other portion of the amendment, and I discussed it, and I said that under this amendment every pension claim in the Pension Office not yet decided at the time this bill shall pass, if it shall become a law, by the order of the Commissioner of Pensions could be referred to this court. That is what I said, and that is the language of it.

Mr. WITHERS. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me a moment?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. WITHERS. I will state in explanation that the whole object of the amendment to the amendment was to effect, if possible, such a change in the phraseology of the original amendment as would render it no longer obnoxious to the point of order; that it sought simply to prescribe the methods and conditions under which the money appropriated by this bill should be expended; and that it consequently only operated for one year, the desire being to remove the objection made by the point of order. I would state in addition that the criticism of the Senator from Illinois is not, in my judgment, well founded, taking the phraseology of the amendment itself as the basis for interpretation.

Mr. LOGAN. That is a difference of opinion.

Mr. WITHERS. The point which the Senator stated was carefully considered before I offered the amendment to the amendment, and it was designed to obviate the very objection which he has urged, that the phraseology used in the amendment was adopted so as to make it applicable to the cases not now on the pension-rolls, so far as it is practicable to do so, it being the intent and object of the amendment that those cases which had been examined in the Pension Office, as the Senator from Iowa has well said, and the proof of which had been nearly or quite perfected, should not be affected at all by the operations of the amendment. But still it is an amendment offered by myself to an amendment pending, and it is entirely within the province of the Senate, if they think proper to do so, to vote down that amendment, and I should vote it down myself if I believed it was obnoxious to the objection made by the Senator from Illinois; which I do not believe.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Of course the Senator from Illinois did not wish to place the bill or those who favor it in any false position. We are not to suppose that of each other at all; and yet I submit to him in all candor whether it is precisely fair to criticise as part of the bill coming from the committee and subject the bill to criticism as it came from the committee on account of an amendment offered by an individual member of the Senate to the bill as it came from the committee.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator certainly does not understand what I said. I spoke of it as being an amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia, which was before the Senate to become a part of the original amendment, and therefore I discussed it the same as if it were a part of the measure, for the reason it had to be voted upon by the Senate the same as the bill. I said substantially this, that even without that amendment under the provisions of the bill offered by the Committee on Pensions as an amendment to the appropriation bill, without the amendment that I was discussing, the Commissioner has authority if he so desires to remit back to this court or whatever it may be an examination of the cases not yet allowed at the time the bill shall pass; and I will state the reason, so that the Senator can see exactly what my position is. You provide nowhere in the bill any rules or regulations as to what cases they shall examine or what cases they shall not examine, but you leave the whole thing to the Commissioner of Pensions to make rules and regulations for this court, or for these examiners, for witnesses, for everything connected with the pension claims not yet determined, and that under these rules and regulations he may remand these cases for examination. I said that substantially, and I repeat it. That is in the bill, and it is a part of the bill without the amendment to it.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The situation, then, is thus: the Senate Committee on Pensions prepare and report to the Senate a bill. An individual member of the Senate proposes an amendment to that bill, and the Senator from Illinois in discussing the general features of the bill incorporates in it, without the vote of the Senate, the proposed amendment to the bill of the committee. It seems to me it is hardly legitimate to do that, but the Senator from Illinois must judge for himself. But the Senator insists that leaving this amdedment out, under the provisions of the bill it is in the power of the Commissioner of Pensions to refer to this examining court the evidence in claims where the evidence is already complete, and the evidence taken in cases where the evidence is not yet completed. It seems to me that is a very strange assumption. You might just as well say that the Commissioner of Pensions can at this time, if we do not pass the bill proposed as an amendment to the appropriation bill, throw aside all the proof in all these cases and compel all parties to begin over again. One is just as reasonable as the other.

If after the passge of this bill the Commissioner of Pensions can throw aside the testimony taken in completed cases and require them to be re-examined before this board, then he can throw aside under the authority he now has that same proof and require the claimant to go to work again and reproduce it. What is the purpose of the bill? The purpose of the bill is to furnish the complete testimony necessary to the determination of pension cases, to furnish it where it has not yet been furnished, and complete it where it has been partially furnished. That is the purpose of the bill. That is the only purpose of the bill in this feature of it; and to say that because we provide a different mode of furnishing proof, that has not been furnished, therefore the Commissioner will be justified in throwing aside the proof that has been taken under the existing law, is presuming upon not only a degree of imbecility upon the part of any Commissioner that is incredible, but is presuming, it seems to me, somewhat largely upon the credulity of the body to whom the argument is addressed.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator does not wish to misinterpret what I said, and I think he will agree with me if he will reflect for a moment. Under the law the Commissioner of Pensions has a right to reject any case. He has a right to send any case back for examination. He has a right to send a special agent to examine any pensioner or claimant. He has a right to send a surgeon to do that. Now, if he has these rights, and you give him a right to make rules and regulations under the present measure that you desire enacted, without prescribing any mode in the bill ourselves, but leave it to him to do it, I ask if it is not reasonable to suppose that he can send a case back if he has a suspicion. Suppose the case is complete so far as the evidence is concerned. If it is complete, why does he not allow it? But inasmuch as it is complete, and he does not allow it, and has a suspicion of the case, can he not send that case back to these examiners you propose for examination? Is not the authority broad enough in your proposed law to do that? Do you not contemplate that? That is exactly what I said, that he could send all these cases back to this board that you authorize for a re-examination. I do not mean for retaking all the evidence, but for supporting it or examining it, for ascertaining all about it, he may send every one of them back; and you provide for that very thing in your proposition by giving him authority to make all rules and regulations in reference to evidence, in reference to examinations, in reference to everything else except merely you provide for the appointment of certain persons. That is what I said, and I still say it; and that is exactly what your proposition is.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The Senator from Illinois can ask a longer question than almost any person that I ever knew.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not ask a question. I was only stating my proposition.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I said, and desire to repeat, that the Commissioner of Pensions has not and will not have a particle of power with reference to a claim after this amendment shall have been passed, if it shall pass, that he has not to-day with reference to cases now pending in his office. I will be glad to have the attention of the Senator from Illinois while I repeat that. I say if this bill shall pass the Commissioner of Pensions will not have under it one particle of power in regard to cases in which the testimony is complete or partially furnished and incomplete that he has not to-day in regard to the same identical cases.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator will understand that my whole argument went to the point that the Commissioner of Pensions under the present law had all the power he could desire and all the power that any Congress ought to give him. That was my argument. I do say he has the power under the present law, and inasmuch as he has it under the present law, why do you wish to change it so as to throw it into another channel which is cumbersome and inconvenient? That is exactly the point I made in my argument, that all the power that is necessary for the Commissioner of Pensions for examining claimants by special agents, by surgeons, by boards of surgeons, wherever he has a suspicion, exists under the law now ample and complete. That is exactly what I said, and I say so still.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The Senator has a right to say it as often as he has the opportunity.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator asked me if that was not so and I just repeated it. You appealed to me to know and I thought I would state it to you.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I understood the Senator from Illinois to claim that this bill as presented here gave to the Commissioner of Pensions, in case it should pass, power that he had not in regard to the procurement of proof in cases pending before him. I say the Senator from Illinois is mistaken in that regard. I say the bill is designed only and can be used only by any man with common sense to enable the Commissioner of Pensions to complete the proof in uncompleted cases, and to procure the proof in cases where no proof has been produced already, and where cases are complete now in their proof before the Commissioner of Pensions it is perfectly idle to argue or assert that those cases completed will be sent to anybody for investigation. The Commissioner has power to-day when he takes up a case in which the proof is completed to say "I will not determine it, but I will require additional proof;" or, "I will have all these witnesses testify over again." He has that power to-day, but no man exercises it; and I say the bill does not give to the Commissioner of Pensions in this regard, in the examination of claims, one particle of power beyond that which he has to-day in the same direction. It merely changes the mode in which the incomplete testimony shall be produced or new testimony taken.

The Senator says that the Commissioner of Pensions has to-day full, ample, and complete power over the whole subject. He has too much power, and this bill is designed to curtail his power in some particulars. In one very important particular it is designed to curtail his power. There is one thing that has caused, and properly caused, an immense deal of hard feeling among the soldiers of our country, and that is the fact that pensions already granted are suspended without giving the pensioner a chance to be heard.

Mr. LOGAN. What do you propose to do with that case?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I will say directly if the Senator will give me time to make my speech within my time. When the present Commissioner of Pensions came into office——

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator does not wish, I know, to be incorrect on the record, and if he will allow me I will read to him the law to show that the Commissioner cannot suspend a pensioner to-day unless he gives him notice. That is the law now.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Read the law.

Mr. LOGAN. I read section 3 of the act of June 21, 1879:

That sections 4771, 4772, and 4773 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, providing for biennial examinations of pensioners, are hereby repealed: Provided, That the Commissioner of Pensions shall have the same power as heretofore to order special examinations, whenever, in his judgment, the same may be necessary, and to increase or reduce the pension according to right and justice; but in no case shall a pension be withdrawn or reduced except upon notice to the pensioner and a hearing upon sworn testimony, except as to the certificate of the examining surgeon.

That is the law now.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Certainly it is, but what does that refer to?

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator said the bill proposed as an amendment could not allow the Commissioner to reduce a pension without giving notice. I say that is the law now.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The Senator is incorrect in making the statement. I did not say that the Commissioner of Pensions had power now to reduce the amount of pension a man was receiving without notice, but I say he has to-day the power to suspend a man's claims, to suspend his pension, upon the theory that it is fraudulent. That is a different thing from reducing the amount of a soldier's pension. Does the Senator from Illinois deny that to-day the Commissioner of Pensions can exercise the power upon the ground that a claim is fraudulent to suspend the payment of that claim entirely and drop the name from the roll?

Mr. LOGAN. Of course he can do it.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Of course he can, and he ought not to have the power to do it.

Mr. LOGAN. You do not take the power from him in the amendment which you support.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. If it passes he would not have the power to do it. When the present Commissioner of Pensions came into office, the rule was, as it came down to him, that when there was reason to suspect that a claim was fraudulent, a special agent was sent out, who took affidavits and returned them with his report to the Pension Office; and thereupon very often a poor pensioner found his name dropped from the pension-roll, and the first knowledge he had of that fact was a notification from the pension agent that he was to receive no more pension. The present Commissioner changed that by his own order. He required that after the special agent had gone by his order into a neighborhood to examine into the question whether or not a claim was fraudulent, and had taken such evidence as he could gather upon that point, he should then notify the pensioner not of the names of the witnesses but of the substance of the testimony against him, and he should then take the testimony of such witnesses as the pensioner would produce. In other words, the present Commissioner of Pensions, against whom so much complaint is made, liberalized the rule; but it is still left in the power of the Commissioner by means of this secret agency to drop a pensioner from the roll. The bill of which the Senator from Illinois complains so much guards against all that in the future, and takes that power from the Commissioner of Pensions, except in cases where the party whose pension is attacked has full notice of it, and has the right to go before this pension court, as it is called, and hear the testimony of the witnesses against him and produce counter testimony upon his own side to sustain his claim, a privilege never had before.

Mr. LOGAN. It is the law now.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. No, sir, it is not the law now unless I am mistaken. If this bill shall pass, what will follow? As I said, the present force in the Pension Office will be set to work to assort the claims in that office, laying aside for determination those in which the proof is complete, preparing abstracts showing what additional proof is needed in cases where the proof is incomplete, and referring to this pensioners' court the claim in which no proof has been presented. Then the force in the Pension Office goes to work to determine and settle those cases that are complete and which should be allowed to-day and which would be allowed to-day if they were not smothered in by hundreds and thousands of incomplete cases standing before them on the calendar of the Pension Office.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him what there is to hinder them from assorting the cases now without passing this bill? There is nothing in the world except that they do not want to do it; that is all.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. No, the Senator is mistaken. I have been instrumental in doing it perhaps as well as the Senator, and I have felt all the time that I was perhaps doing wrong. The man whose claim is incomplete has a right to be heard in his order as well as the man whose claim is complete. The Senator and myself and other Senators who hear me have been sending letters to the Commissioner of Pensions asking to have cases taken up out of their order, and it sometimes has been done; and every time it has been done injustice has been done to some other men who have not made that application to a friend in Washington. Every time you go to work to take up a case out of its order you delay just so much longer the examination of the cases that stand before it. It is done occasionally, and yet it is not fair that it should be done. The work of from ten to twenty clerks at every session of Congress that we are here is taken up in that way that should be devoted to the examination of these claims. The attention of those clerks is taken up in answering the letters that members of Congress send there inquiring about the condition of claims out of their order.

One of the troubles in regard to testimony taken in these cases is that it is taken very frequently before justices of the peace who are unskilled in preparing affidavits, and it often happens (I have seen it over and over again in cases passing through my hands as a member of the Committee on Pensions) that an affidavit, where probably the witness knew all that was important to be told, has been put down in so bungling a way that it is worth no more in the case than so much waste paper. A witness will state his conclusions merely without stating the facts upon which he bases his conclusions or his means of knowledge. A great amount of the testimony taken in that way under the present system, by men who do not understand either the pension law or know the way to prepare testimony, is perfectly useless, because wholly informal and not containing that which is necessary to give it validity.

If the system proposed prevails nine-tenths of the witnesses perhaps will be taken before men who do understand what the pension law is; men who do understand how affidavits should be prepared in order to give them force and effect, and there their testimony will be reduced to writing, and brought in proper form before the board that has to determine upon the validity of the claim. You will find these courts in every congressional district in our country, and you will gather together the testimony much more speedily than it is now gathered in the way of writing letters from one part of the country to another part of the country, asking for the appearance of men before a justice of the peace to give their testimony in the way indicated. It promises more speedy results; it promises more certain results; and because it promises more speedy results and because it promises more certain results it is for the benefit of the men who are to be benefited by these pensions if they shall ever be granted.

At one time it was said of this proposed law that it entailed an enormous expense upon the pensioner. The idea was given out that he had to pay the fees that would be charged by those men for doing this work. It is wholly a mistake. The pensioner does not pay one cent of the fees provided for in the bill; it is all paid by the Government. The only expense he is put to is in getting his witnesses to the place where this testimony is to be given.

Mr. LOGAN. That is the only expense there is about it.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. And that he has to do now. I suppose he has to do that now. There is no provision of law I know of that entitles the pensioner now to get his neighbor to go to the county seat, or any place else, to give his testimony without paying for it.

Mr. LOGAN. It is now taken before a justice of the peace.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Yes; he can go before a justice of the peace; but then he must go with the affidavit from the justice of the peace to the county seat to get the seal of the clerk of the court upon it, and he must pay the clerk of the court for doing that.

Mr. LOGAN. The pensioner has to do that?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. But he does not have to take the witness there, and the expense of taking a witness there is avoided as the law now stands.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I think the experience of the Senator from Illinois is that nine-tenths or a large portion of these affidavits are taken at the county seat at last. The pensioner must get his witness to go some place to get his affidavit, and under the present system he must pay his expenses, and if it is taken before a justice, as I before said, he must then take the affidavit after he has it to the county seat, and get attached to it the seal of the clerk of the court of the county to show that the justice of the peace is a justice, and he must pay the fees consequent upon that. Under this bill we make some changes in that regard. Declarations, as they are called, must now be made before a court of record; that is, the declaration of the party applying for a pension must be made before a court of record. Under this bill those declarations would be made before this pension court, as it is called. If they are made before a court of record the expense attending upon it is to be paid by the applicant. If they are made under this bill before this pension court they are made without any expense to the pensioner.

Again, as to the section in regard to the increase of pension for disability, under the existing law, when an application is made for an increase of pension by reason of an increase of disability, if the increase is granted that now commences from the date of the examination before the surgeon upon whose report the increase is allowed. For instance, a man is rated upon the pension-rolls at a certain rate to-day. His pension ought to be increased as he thinks, and he applies to the Pension Commissioner for an increase. After awile his request is taken up and examined, and an order is sent out for his examination before an examining surgeon at some time in the future, and if the increase is approved, under the existing law that increase dates from the report of the surgeon. Under this bill if the increase is allowed, it dates from the time of his application for the increase, a benefit to him of several months or perhaps a year in each case.

Again, the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] who I do not now see in his seat, on Saturday, when the Senator from Illinois was speaking upon this subject, said that the county in which he lived was something like two hundred miles long, and that it would be a great distance for witnesses in that county to come from all parts of it to the place where this pension court would sit; and I understood the Senator from Illinois to say that under this bill they would have to go there. Let me read section 5 of the bill now proposed by the Senator from Virginia as an amendment.

That in case medical examinations of pensioners and pension claimants, or the testimony of any witnesses, are required, which cannot well be made or obtained, or which it appears to the Commissioner of Pensions are unnecessary to be made or obtained in the manner provided in section 2 of this act, the same may be made or obtained in such other manner as the Commissioner of Pensions shall direct; and he is hereby required to make convenient rules and regulations for the making of such medical examinations and for the obtaining of such testimony, and to that end may designate any surgeon convenient to the pensioner or claimant to make the medical examination, and any officer authorized to administer oaths convenient to the proposed witnesses to take such testimony, notice of time and place of taking such testimony having previously been given to claimant.

There is a complete answer to the question asked by the Senator from Maine. It will be inconvenient, doubtless, to bring all these witnesses to the county seat, especially in sparsely-settled portions of our country, such as the county in which the Senator from Maine says he lives, and so in our Territories; and in order to avoid that the Commissioner of Pensions is not only authorized, but he is required to make regulations by which this testimony can be taken by a local officer authorized to take oaths, and by which the examinations to be made by the surgeon can be made by a local surgeon, avoiding the very difficulty suggested by the Senator from Maine on Saturday, which still remained in the mind of the Senator from Illinois, although he was engaged in discussing this section of the bill among others.

The Senator from Illinois on Saturday drew a very pathetic picture of a poor soldier in his own State, I believe, who had been in the Union service during the war, and was poor and sick and unable to furnish the proof requisite to establish his right to a pension. I do not see precisely the pertinence of that pathetic story. What is the duty of the Commissioner of Pensions? Some people seem to apprehend that he is placed in his office with a discretionary power to grant a pension to any person he may think entitled to it; that if a strong appeal is made to his sympathy and his sympathetic feelings overcome him, then he may grant a pension upon his sympathy; in other words, that he has the power to say in substance for what causes pensions shall be granted. I do not so understand the duty of the Commissioner of Pensions at all. He is an officer of the Government, appointed and sworn to execute the law we make for him. The law-making power of the Government determines what causes shall entitle a man to a pension: it specifies those causes in the statutes relating to pensions and the Commissioner of Pensions sits there as a judge sits in a court, not to say what the law should be but to say what the law is. He has no more right to allow a pension outside of the law under which he acts than you, Mr. President, [Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair,] when sitting upon the bench of the courts of your State had a right to allow a plaintiff to recover against a defendant when he did not furnish proof under the law to show that he was entitled to recover. That is, I understand, the duty of the Commissioner of Pensions.

There are thousands of men, unfortunately, in our country who are entitled to pensions if they could make the necessary proof; but the men by whom they could make the proof are dead or they cannot be found, and the proof cannot be made. I repeat it, unless the proof be made to bring the case within the law as we write it the Commissioner of Pensions is not only powerless to grant a pension, but he would violate his oath of office if he did grant a pension without that proof. Therefore Congress in its capacity as a law-maker is appealed to at every session of Congress, and bills are brought before the Senate and before the House, sitting as a court of equity to grant relief where by the strict rules of the law the Commissioner of Pensions cannot do it; and your Committee on Pensions in this body and your Committee on Pensions in the other body once at least in every week have their time taken up in the examination of these cases, and when they find, as they do find frequently, that although the proof is too incomplete to justify the Commissioner of Pensions to allow a pension, yet, looking at the case in its broad equity, the man is, in their judgment, entitled to a pension, they make a law for his case, because every special act which we pass here granting a pension is a law made to cover the particular case of a man for whose benefit it is passed. It is not right that the impression should go abroad that the Commissioner of Pensions has discretion to override the law and grant pensions where the proof does not come within the law and come up to the law. It is possible that a person might be found to take the office of Commissioner of Pensions who would disregard the obligations of the oath he takes and erect himself into a law-making power instead of a power to administer the law. That is possible, but I do not think it is desirable. It seems to me it would be rather dangerous to allow any man, soldier or civilian, to have the power to say that in his judgment such and such a man ought to have a pension, and because of his judgment to give him one.

When I was speaking a short time ago of the work done by the present Commissioner of Pensions, I omitted to notice one fact to which I wish to call attention in his justification. It is complained, bitterly complained, that great delay occurs in the hearing of pension cases. It undoubtedly is so; it must continue to be so; and much more will it continue, in my judgment, if this bill should not pass. But how has it been in the past? In 1880, the year just closed, there were decided in the Pension Office of cases that had been commenced in 1862 fifteen cases, that had been there for eighteen years, thirteen years before the present Commissioner took his office. Of cases commenced in 1863 there were two hundred and fifty-nine cases decided by the Commissioner during the last year. Of cases commenced in 1864 there were two hundred and twenty-two cases decided during the last year. Of cases commenced in 1865 there were one hundred and seventy-nine decided during the last year. Of cases commenced in 1866 there were two hundred and forty-five; of cases commenced in 1867 there were one hundred and ninety-four; of cases commenced in 1868 there were one hundred and nine; of cases commenced in 1869 there were sixty-four; of cases commenced in 1870 there were two hundred and thirty-three. Of cases commenced between 1862 and 1865, counting both years, there were six hundred and seventy-five disposed of last year by the present Commissioner of Pensions; and of cases commenced between 1860 and 1870, counting both years, there were 1,520 decided by the present Commissioner of Pensions during the last year. So that it seems that we have had a series of incompetent Commissioners, if time is to be the only means by which we are to judge of their efficiency.

I believe that I have consumed as much of the time of the Senate as I desire to consume in this matter. I have but to say further that the idea has been held forth that this is the Commissioner's bill; that it is Bentley's bill. I am not speaking of what is done on the floor here, but what is done outside. An effort having been made, as I think unjustly, to make him unpopular this appellation is given to the bill for the purpose of making it unpopular, as well as the Commissioner. The bill is not the bill of the Commissioner of Pensions; it is the bill of the Committee on Pensions. They are responsible for it; they have consulted with him about it largely; and they have consulted with the pension agents as well; but the responsibility for reporting the bill rests with the Committee on Pensions; the responsibility for its authorship rests with the Committee on Pensions; and for one I assume cheerfully my share of that responsibility.

I do not propose to compete here or elsewhere in making statements of devotion to the interest of the soldiers of our country who served in the Union Army. Those of them in my own State have I apprehend formed their opinion whether or not I am their friend. I am sure they have not done it because I ever professed to be especially their friend. If they have made up their mind in my favor it has been for some reason other than my special protestations of friendship for them. I have allowed them to judge in regard to that matter from what I have done instead of from what I have said. I do not pretend here to say what their judgment may be on that subject, but I am satisfied that if their judgment is, as I hope it is, that I have tried in my way in the past to show by my actions that I am their friend, however they may differ with me as to the merits of this bill, that will not change their opinion. If they should think, as I do not, that this is not a good bill, they will overlook my support of it because they will think I have erred by mistake and not by intention.

I was anxious to have this bill discussed before the country, so that both sides of it could be presented. But one side of it has been presented until quite recently. During the last year men occupying prominent places, as I understand, among the soldiers of the country, in what is called the Grand Army of the Republic, had their attention called to this bill by a speech made by the Commissioner of Pensions some place North, I do not remember where, and by their request a large number of copies of the bill were sent to different posts of the Grand Army of the Republic, in order that they might examine the bill upon its merits, and not take the statements of those who opposed it as a means of judging of this question.

I had the opportunity the other day of presenting nearly one hundred memorials and resolutions passed by different posts of the Grand Army of the Republic in favor of the passage of this bill. I have also presented a number of petitions against its passage, two this morning. But as an indication of the means taken to prejudice the public mind in regard to this bill and to create the impression that it is an unsafe bill for the soldiers, I will relate a single instance, and then relieve the Senate. Within the last ten days I received a letter from a lady living in the State of Iowa, written in pathetic language, entreating me to oppose the passage of this bill as one calculated and intended to injure the soldiers of the country. I answered the lady, of course, as respectfully as I knew how, telling her that I thought she was mistaken as to the tenor and effect of the bill, and that I was sure she was mistaken as to the purpose of those by whom it was promoted; and the matter passed from my mind. A few days afterward I saw, I think in the New York Tribune, in some one of the New York papers, a piece of information picked up by these irrepressible reporters who have a faculty of discovering everything, it appears, and are bound to print it when they discover it. It gave the form of a letter to be addressed to members of Congress in both Houses, and the letter I received from the lady in Iowa was a precise copy of the letter sent out from this city, I suppose, all over the country. I fortunately had enough of the letter preserved to compare it word by word, letter by letter. The poor woman had received that circular and had gone to the trouble of sitting down and copying it twice, sending one copy of it to me and one copy to the other House, I suppose, to her member there, and knowing nothing at all in regard to the merits of the bill more than was contained in the circular of the agency by which it was sent to her.

I repeat what I said before, a persistent, a determined, and an unscrupulous effort has been made outside of this Chamber to prejudice this system in the minds of the men who are to be benefited by it and for whose benefit it has been originated; and I trust that this discussion, if it has no other effect, will have the effect of showing that there are other men, as well as those who have outside of this Chamber sought to misrepresent this bill, who are their true friends.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to discuss this bill any further, but with one statement I wish to give notice that if this amendment shall not be adopted, as I hope it will not, I shall propose an amendment. I have a bill somewhere with the amendment on it. I had the bill and the amendment together.

I want to call the Senator's attention just to one thing, not by way of discussion, but that he may look over his memorandum and see whether he is not mistaken in calling the attention of the Senate to the amount of claims allowed from 1861 to 1871. I think he forgot to state the number of claims that have been allowed during the last year. I desire to make the statement that during the last year 4,000 claims were allowed during one month and 200 rejected. At that rate 48,000 claims would be allowed during a year, with 2,400 rejected. According to that rate, in three years every pension claim in the Pension Office would be examined and allowed or rejected. The Senator fails to state that in the examination of the 300,000 pension claims that he speaks of there are included in that 300,000 over 80,000 rejected claims, that stand on the books to-day rejected, which leaves only about 220,000 claims there to be examined. I make this statement so that the Senator can examine and see whether he is correct, or whether I am.

What I desired to state was that the five hundred and forty officers who are to be appointed under this amendment, if you rate them at $3,000, and I do not believe you can get officers for less than $3,000 a year, will be over a million and a half of dollars per annum.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The bill provides expressly that they shall not receive a dollar except their fees and $3 a day.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand that, but the fees are bound to come up to that, or you cannot get the proper men to perform the office. That is what I speak of. That will amount to a million and a half per annum that the Government must pay for fees and salaries, and if you say you can get them for $2,000 a year, that will amount to over a million a year right under your bill. Now, if they can allow 4,000 pension claims per month with the present force they have, the amendment that I shall propose is to increase the salary of the chiefs of divisions, I do not remember how many there are, probably eight or nine, to $2,000 per annum, so that men may be selected who are perfectly competent. They can be obtained for that amount of money, and perhaps the very chiefs who are there now are competent. I also shall propose to increase the clerical force fifty, which will be sufficient, or, if that is not sufficient, more; but fifty are as many as are asked for at any time. I propose to give the Commissioner that. A thousand dollars a year for the fifty clerks will be $50,000, and the increase on the other salaries will be $200 a year each, which will be about two thousand dollars, which will make $52,000. For $52,000 you can get all the necessary labor to perform what this million and a half of dollars would perform, and it would be better performed. That is the amendment which I shall propose to the bill, provided the bill is not considered out of order as an amendment to an appropriation bill. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. A single word in reply, if the Senate will indulge me. I am glad the Senator called my attention to the fact that in the month of October an unusually large number of pension claims was allowed. That was so, and why?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know why.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Perhaps the Senator will appreciate the reason I give him.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly. I do not understand it.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The Commissioner of Pensions is in his position a good deal like a character I have read of who had a choice between the devil and the deep sea. He was pressed upon one side, and hardly pressed, to take up and examine claims, in which the proof is completed, out of their order; he is pressed upon the other side by those whose claims are not complete to take up everything in its order, so that the incomplete claimants may be informed of what is necessary to their completion. That is the dilemma he finds himself in. In October or September, I do not remember which, he yielded to the pressure in one direction and did take up out of their order a number of claims and decided them, and by his so doing he delayed just so much longer the giving to the men whose claims were incomplete the information they had the right to expect at his hand in its order. That is the explanation, as I understand it, of that matter. Perhaps the Commissioner of Pensions did wrong, but Senators who have been pressing him to do that identical thing are not the men to find fault with him because he did it.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator will understand that I am finding no fault. I only insist that he ought to do the same character of work every month, and not make the month of October an exception.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Then the Senator from Illinois will get upon his back all the class of men whose claims will be delayed by doing that sort of thing, the men the hearing of whose cases will be set back because that particular thing is done. He will, of course, get the applause of men who are benefited by it, but he should consider as well the interests of those who will not be benefited but prejudiced by it.

Mr. LOGAN. Congress was not in session in October, so that these particular requests from members of Congress that the Senator refers to certainly do not apply to that labor that I have suggested.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Oh, the requests go from home as well as from the Capitol; they go from our residences as well as from here. Now I will detain the Senate no longer.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. President, is an amendment now in order to the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I have an amendment to offer when the time comes.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The first vote, then, is to be taken upon the point of order, and that as I understand it will settle the question as to whether we can put in an amendment to the amendment or not. The amendment is impracticable as it now stands so far as my State is concerned. The bill as it stands now would have to be amended before it could be practically enforced in my State. The bill provides for one set of these officers in each congressional district.

Mr. LOGAN. And you have but one?

Mr. SAUNDERS. We have but one congressional district in our State, and this bill provides that the officers to be appointed under it shall visit each county seat three times in the year, besides other duties. We have, I think, sixty-seven organized counties in my State, which would make over two hundred visits; and if you give them one day at each county seat, and that would be little time enough, it would require four hundred days for one year's work. So the Senate can see at once that it would be impossible to carry out the provisions of the amendment so far as the State that I have the honor in part to represent would be concerned.

I have taken no particular part in the debate on this subject; I have left it to those who have examined it more carefully than I have; but I have been governed a good deal by those in the country who are interested in this matter and who examine these things fully as closely as we do here. I am governed by the men who are interested in it. I am getting letters every day from the country on this subject, and nine out of ten of them condemn the provisions of this amendment. I have one right here now that is a sample on one point, and I do not think that point was answered fully by the Senator from Iowa. This letter I received this morning. The writer says:

If the Senate bill No. 496 becomes a law, I shall not be able to prove up my claim, for it will be impossible for me to get my witnesses before the pension courts, as I could not pay their expenses. I beg you to do all you can to defeat that bill and all others like it.

Then the writer further says:

My claim is just, and I do not care how many spies or detectives come down to investigate it, but if the bill (S. No. 496) becomes a law I will have to give up and lose the pension that I am properly entitled to. Only a pension claimant with money could prove up a claim under that law, and a person with money does not need the pension.

Mr. WITHERS. If the Senator will pemit me one moment, I will just state that that is a verbatim copy of a circular which was sent out from here, and I have got forty letters nearly indentically in the same language.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I have got them in different language. I get some of them in the language of that circular, and some I am sure are original. I presented remonstrances this morning from men whom I know to be very intelligent gentlemen—who are able to think for themselves. One of them is a member of the Legislature of the State where he lives, and others who are equally as intelligent with himself, and these men all say that they do not want this bill to become a law. Of course some oppose it for one reason and some for another.

So far as I can understand it the committee have brought in this bill for the purpose mainly of guarding against fraud. I confess that I am unable to see where that prevention comes in. They are allowed to hold their court in each county seat and to examine witnesses and to get their pay according to the number of witnesses. That is, they can only get fifty cents for one, and the inducement is evidently held out to get just as many witnesses as they can. If they can get a dozen witnesses that would be $6; if they have but one witness they would only get fifty cents, so that so far as removing the cause for fraud is concerned it really invites it.

If I could see any advantages in it, I would vote for its passage; but if there are no advantages it is better to take the law we have, for that is now pretty well understood by the people, than to make a new one and be equally confused in understanding it, as was the case with the present bill at the beginning. So far as the people of the country are concerned, they have learned how to prepare their papers and how to bring their witnesses together. I know it was said by the Senator from Iowa that they had to have the same witnesses go before a justice of the peace as they would have to go before these courts under the operation of this bill, but in this case they have got to go on a fixed day, at a certain time when this court is sitting, and it may not be convenient for witnesses to go at such times; whereas, on the other hand, they can take witnesses before a justice of the peace to suit their own time and the convenience of the witnesses themselves, so that it makes in that case against them rather than for them.

I say again that so far as fraud is concerned I cannot see but what the same inducements are held out in this bill that are in the present law, only that this bill provides for two persons to form the court—one, I suppose, to watch the other. One is to be of one party politically, and the other is to belong to the other party, the presumption, I suppose, being that if you get a dishonest man on one side you will get an honest man on the other. Have we any proof of that? If you get an honest man it does not matter to what party he belongs. If you get an honest man one is as good as two or half a dozen; but if you do not get an honest man, then you will be liable to have frauds practiced on the people and upon the Government the same as under the present law, so that it depends after all upon the man. Now, you have individuals going out from the Pension Bureau watching the applicants to prevent fraud being practiced on the Government; I was going to say that there are scores of them out now; at any rate tens are out at this time on that very business, and it does seem to me that they ought to be able to detect most of these frauds at any rate. I cannot see that the provisions of this act would make any improvement in that particular.

I am free to say if we can detect frauds and prevent individuals from getting in fraudulent claims it is our duty to do so, but I do not see that there is anything in the amendment to prevent fraud that is not already in the present law.

Unless I can learn something more on this subject than I know now of I shall vote against the amendment; but if the decision on the question of order should be such that the amendment will finally come before the Senate, it must be amended, as Senators will see, to cover such cases as I have named in the State that I have the honor in part to represent. As I said, the law could not be carried out there at all, because the time would not permit the officers to do the work required of them.

Mr. LOGAN. All the Territories are in the same condition.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes; all the Territories, and some other States are in the same condition.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the vote to be taken is not upon the amendment, but upon the question of order simply. I do not propose myself to express any opinion now upon the amendment nor upon the capabilities of the Commissioner of Pensions. So far as I know he is capable, and the amendment may be good. I have raised the question under the twenty-ninth rule. It seems to me the system is a pernicious one, and one in which we ought not to indulge. If the amendment is ruled to be in order this discussion will go on for some time yet. Here is an appropriation bill that ought to pass, and it ought to pass at once. There is a large deficiency here provided for, and that money ought to be in the hands of the proper authorities to be distributed. If this measure is a meritorious one it can come before the Senate in the way other bills come, and it can then be discussed if further discussion is needed, and pass or fail to pass as the case may be.

Mr. WITHERS. It is not my desire to delay action upon the pension appropriation bill proper. I did desire that something should be said upon the merits of the amendment which I had the honor to propose to the appropriation bill, as the chairman of the Committee on Pensions. It has been so fiercely assailed by Senators on both sides of the Chamber that I thought fairness required that a statement should be made from some one friendly to the amendment before the question of order should be determined by the Senate. I am perfectly willing that the Senate shall vote now upon the question of order submitted; and if the Senate shall determine, as I hope it will, that such an amendment as I propose is in order, I shall then desire to say something more particularly with regard to the details of the measure, and to produce what, in my judgment, are sound arguments to demonstrate that the bill is drawn, as it was designed to be, in the interest of the pensioners as the first consideration, in the interest of the Government as the second consideration, and that it would very materially expedite the decision of pension cases and protect the Government against the payment of pensions to persons not duly entitled to them.

It is not my province particularly to enter upon any defense of the Commissioner of Pensions. If half that has been said on this floor is true, he certainly is utterly unworthy of the confidence of the people or the position which he occupies. But candor and justice alike compel me to bear witness that, so far as my official intercourse with him is concerned, extending now over a period of four or five years, I have found him uniformly anxious apparently, and as I believe sincerely, to promote the interest of the pensioners and protect the interest of the Government at the same time. Certainly his efficiency in the office can be proved, as I think, by reference to the dispatch of business under him, the number of cases which have been determined during his administration being, as I am informed, in excess of those of any of his predecessors for the same period of time.

I wish to say one word simply in regard to the amendment which I offered by the consent of the Senate, as I understood, the other day, the object of which simply was, if possible, to remove the point of order which was made by the Senator from Colorado against the amendment. I think it has been usually held here that an amendment could be ingratted upon a general appropriation bill, the scope and effect of which was simply to limit the expenditure and prescribe the manner in which the expenditure under it was to be made. That is the whole object of the amendment to the amendment which I submitted. It was to limit the operation of the provisions of the amendment to the money appropriated by this bill, and, of course, it would only be of force for the next fiscal year. I think that removes the point of the objection that it is general legislation, at any rate.

Mr. TELLER. It is not possible that the amendment or modification can change the question that this is general legislation. With that kind of amendment the Senator might put on the Revised Statutes, if he saw fit, if they were not already in force. The simple question is whether this is legislation. Nobody can doubt it. I do not believe there is a Senator on this floor who does not know that this is general legislation of the most extensive character.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to state the point of order and have read the rule under which the point of order arises.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rule under which the point of order is made is Rule 27, which will be read by the Secretary.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill; nor shall any amendment not germane or relevant to the subject-matter contained in the bill be received; nor shall any amendment to any item or clause of such bill be received which does not directly relate thereto; and all questions of relevancy of amendments under this rule, when raised, shall be submitted to the Senate and decided without debate; and any amendment to a general appropriation bill may be laid on the table without prejudice to the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I rise simply for the porpose of expressing the hope that a vote may be taken without further discussion upon the point of order. There is no doubt in my own mind that the point of order is well taken. I shall therefore vote to sustain it; and that being my view of the case, of course if it is sustained by a majority of the Senate, further discussion upon the merits of the amendment would be unprofitable. If the debate continue and the amendment should be held to be in order, I shall desire to say something both upon the general subject of pensions and upon the particular provisions of the amendment that has been offered by the Senator from Virginia; but inasmuch as if the point of order should be sustained, discussion will be unavailing, I suggest, without wishing at all to limit debate, whether it would not be wise at this time to take the vote upon that part of the question and leave the rest for future consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Is the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. WITHERS] as modified by him in order under Rule 27?

The question was decided in the negative.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is held by the Senate not to be in order.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the pending question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pension appropriation bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. I offered on Saturday an amendment for the purpose of having it printed. I ask if it has been returned from the Printing-Office? If so, I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] offers an amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. After line 17 it is proposed to insert:

To provide fifty additional examiners for the Pension Office, and the number of clerks for the Pension Office and Adjutant-General's and Surgeon-General's Offices, respectively, necessary to render effective the work of said examiners, the sum of $200,000, to be immediately available.

Mr. WITHERS. I raise the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Virginia to the fact that while we have voted down the proposition to amend the law by substituting new machinery for the old, it is conceded by every one that the pension law, as it at present stands, is not executed as rapidly as it should be to meet the necessities of the case. The trouble is not so much with the law as it is with the delay in its operation; that the pensioners are obliged to wait an unreasonable time for the adjustment of their cases, and while a good deal has been said about frauds on the Government in the obtaining of pensions under the present law, still I think in the main the great complaint, and that which most induced the Pensions Committee to offer the amendment which it did, and which has also been at the bottom of the various devices for new legislation, has been the fact that the present law does not afford to the applicant a speedy adjustment and determination of his claim for pension. My proposition is that the force engaged in the consideration of pension cases shall be increased.

If one hundred and fifty examiners can dispose of fifteen hundred cases a month, two hundred examiners ought to be able to dispose of a proportionately greater number. It is one of those cases which if we do not settle it now is going to be an occasion of great reproach. It is no saving to the Government to postpone the payment of the necessary salaries for the employment of the requisite force to properly consider and determine the pension cases pending and those which are constantly filed. The Senate having said that bill No. 496, as it was called, is not in order as an amendment to the pension appropriation bill, practically says that there shall be no legislation which will give either increased force or increased opportunity or efficiency to the Pension Bureau and that the 300,000 men whose applications are now pending in the Pension Bureau shall continue to cool their heels waiting upon the slow processes of administration under the present law.

The present condition of things is, I think, a national scandal. If we cannot agree that there shall be a new law, we can at least agree that there shall be added force for the purpose of carrying out the old law; and such a provision as I propose affords the only chance for legislation upon this subject the present session. It is only a question of the expenditure of $200,000 more in an endeavor to expedite the business of the Pension Bureau; and this expenditure is as nothing added to the amount we already expend, and even less, when compared to the obligation we are under to the applicants whose claims are postponed and retarded either by lack of proper legislation or of proper administration of the law already on the statute-book. Some time this cost has got to be incurred unless the Government means forever to shirk its obligation to do justice to these men.

And while I am on that subject I desire to say something about that part of this discussion which relates to frauds on the Government. I am not on the committee. I do not undertake to say, because I do not know anything about the percentage of frauds; and with all due respect to everybody I do not believe anybody else knows anything definite about the percentage of frauds perpetrated. The present law may be inefficient for the detection of frauds, and yet it has been shown in this debate that the money heretofore appropriated by Congress for the purpose of detecting frauds has not all been expended. I therefore assume that in the judgment of the Commissioner of Pensions there was not sufficient ground for the use of the money voted and the employment of necessary force for the purpose of discovering frauds. Only about one-half of this money was expended, as the Senator from Illinois reminds me, and if we expect to legislate so as to prevent all fraud we must expect to legislate so as to practically prevent all pensions. You cannot carry on machinery of such magnitude without some fraud being committed. Fraudulent claims are passed in the Quartermaster's Department, and equally there is fraud in the allowance of claims in the Commissary Department. There are frauds committed in all branches of the public service; they are inseparable and always will be from large Government instrumentalities of administration.

This allegation of fraud, however, in this case has been a matter of sore and, as I think on the whole, just complaint from the great body of the ex-soldiers of this country. It has been so persistently urged, so constantly and always insisted upon, stated in so many forms, applied in so many ways, alleged to be of such great magnitude, that it has come to be that every pensioner, more or less, considers himself under the suspicion of "the powers that be" and of the public as a man who has committed a fraud upon the Government in the obtaining of his pension. I think, therefore, Mr. President, that this debate has gone far wrong in that particular. I do not believe that the frauds occurring in the Pension Bureau bear any greater proportion to the amount disbursed than they do in other Departments of the Government. I believe they are only such as are inseparable from the administration of a machine like that bureau. Of course there is opportunity for fraud on account of the large number of cases and the ex parte nature of proof permitted by the law; but I believe that in proportion to the amount expended the frauds are even less than they are in other Departments of the Government, and I do not believe any practical system we can adopt will wholly prevent fraud. The millennium is not here nor is it coming this year. But, however this may be, the first obligation on the part of the Government is not to detect fraud, but to discharge faithfully and fully the obligations it is under to these men.

A good deal has been said, not only in debate, but in public prints, about the amount of money involved in the payment of pensions, present and prospective. I do not know where all these statements emanate nor how authentic they may be, but I am prepared so far as my action is concerned to accept the statement that the amount of money which will be necessary to pay the arrears of pensions is $510,000,000, and, assuming that to be the obligation due to the pensioners growing out of the loss of health, of limb, or life, I shall not hesitate to vote for its appropriation, nor would I hesitate if the amount were four times greater, no more than I would hesitate to vote the amount, however large, to meet the ordinary and necessary expenses of the Government.

It is, after all that can be said, only a question as to whether a great Government will pay its debt, not a debt in the ordinary sense of the term, but a debt that is more sacred, a debt that should rest upon the Government with a higher sense of obligation than a debt representing money borrowed or ordinary service rendered. The question of amount does not properly come in. It is a question as to the existence of the obligation and as to whether the Government is able to discharge it.

It has been well said that things seen are mightier than things heard. The time was when this nation did not think of higgling over the question of its obligations to these men, and when those in station here and the loyal people of the whole country considered only whether the men whose wrongs we are considering would be able by their courage, by their risk of blood and life and the sacrifice of their health to save the Government. At that time they could have had pensions and increase of pay unto the last farthing of the ability of the Government of the people for the asking. They did not avail themselves of their opportunity. But they did rely, as they had a right to, upon the faith of the Government, pledged in statutes then in force, that those who lost limbs or health in the line of duty should be entitled to pensions; and every soldier who went into the Army went in understanding that obligation of the Government and relying upon it just as much as he relied upon the promise that he should be paid the monthly pittance he received under the name of pay. After the war Congress established a law of limitation, providing that claims not filed within five years should not be entitled to go back to the date of discharge. Two years ago that limitation was extended to the 1st day of July last. This was not done very freely; it met with some opposition, and it was said in the public prints that it was opening the doors of the Treasury to jobs, and so on.

Mr. President, the law-making power had no right to establish an arbitrary rule which required the soldier to come within a certain and very limited period from the time of his discharge and file his claim for a pension or be cut off from all right to that pension which accrued prior to the time of his application. It was a rule which worked unjustly; it was a rule which ought to have been wiped out, as it was; and before this bill passes I shall move an amendment enlarging the operation of the arrears-of-pensions act so as to permit claims to be filed during the next two years, the applicants in which shall come within the provisions of that act.

It is said, why did not these soldiers come in and file their claims immediately after their discharge? When the war was over the men who rejoiced over its close more than any other men were those who served in the Army. The men outside who made money, who enjoyed the ease of home, the honors of civil employment, the profits incident to a condition of war, which drew off a large percentage of the energetic, ambitious, competent men of the country, were not nearly so anxious for the close of the strife as were the men who carried the musket, and by whose valor and sacrifice the country was saved. They were not only glad to be mustered out and go back to their families and homes, but they asked neither bounty nor station as a reward for patriotic service performed. They were so rejoiced at the result accomplished by their sacrifice that they did not think or care to set up a claim against the Government for pension on account of loss of health in the line of duty. They were proud of their achievements, and the feeling was quite general among all, who did not then realize that they had suffered serious and irreparable injury, that seeking a pension would detract from the merit of their service.

Few of them realized then that the seeds of disease, never to be eradicated, had been lodged in their bodies by that service; that sleeping on the ground and in the swamps, marching night and day, exposed to cold, wet, hunger, and all the vicissitudes and privations incident to military service, had made inroads upon their health which would remain a legacy of that service so long as they lived, and in many cases make life a burden.

These men went back to find the avenues which before they had filled closed against them. Whether mechanics, lawyers, laborers, farmers, merchants, the vacancies made by their enlistment were filled by others. Their places had not been kept open waiting for their return. They had to begin anew. In many cases that was impossible in the old location, and new ones had to be sought out. So they went South, and East, and West, poor in purse and growing poorer in many cases; rich only in the consciousness of duty done, and in the pride of a power exercised for the common good and laid down at the time when it might have been used to the advantage of those who wielded it.

And so it is to-day that there are more ex-soldiers of the Union Army in proportion to the total of population in the State of Kansas than in any State east of the Mississippi River, and they are not there alone because they preferred to be there of all places, but largely because they had to go somewhere. They could not stay where they before had lived. They have drifted about; many of them coming to realize by degrees what they had no suspicion of when they were mustered out, that their health had been broken by their service. Generally, however, so long as they could live in any degree of comfort by their own labor, the thought of pension did not come, or if it came it was put aside as something not to be thought of, or as something to be held in reserve until the necessity was absolute. There was, too, the old feeling of pride that the great merit of their service would be tarnished by applying for a pension.

But poverty and disease broke down even aspirations of that kind; and there are men who went out of the service a little halt, a little broken down, who thought the rest they would get and the quiet of a life at home would repair these misfortunes, but who find that they were mistaken; that they are getting worse instead of better; and finally yielding to the inevitable they come now and ask the Government to give them what was part of their contract and part of the promise under which they served it; and I say they ought not to be turned away under a plea that they did not come in time.

I know a man who enlisted in the Army from Kansas, who at the date of his enlistment was comparatively a wealthy man for that day and for that location. His eyesight was impaired during his service, not permanently as he hoped. When his term of enlistment expired he went back to the calling from which he had gone to enter the service. In a few years he lost his money in unprofitable ventures, and finally he lost his eyesight. Then, with great reluctance, he concluded to apply for a pension, but the statute of limitations, which Congress had imposed, cut him off from all benefit for the time pending his application, until the passage of the arrears act gave a sum of money, with which he bought a small farm, and to-day he sits in the door of a Kansas cabin with his face turned toward a beautiful landscape which he will never see; and but for the arrears act he would to-day be in an almshouse. He is poor, but relieved from absolute want; but his sacrifice and suffering no money can compensate for. The country is still his debtor, and ought not to begrudge him the pittance which lightens the burden of his blighted life.

Another man, who lives only a few miles away from the former, came out of the Army with eyesight impaired, as the consequence of his service. He thought he could be cured. He spent all his substance and nearly ten years of his time in trying all available specialists and remedies, but all to no avail. He is nearly blind. He was and is entitled to a pension; but, poor though he is and helpless, he has never applied, though justly entitled to a pension. His pride has prevailed over suffering and poverty. Some day he may be compelled to apply for a pension, and there should be no statute of limitations to stand in his way, but the door should be kept constantly open for him.

These are but samples. Similar cases exist all over the country.

I have a letter in my possession from a lady writing about a pension that she is applying for. I have known her for twenty-five years—a noble woman, born to fortune; but her husband's service was the beginning of a poverty which will follow her as long as she lives. She writes me about her application for pension. She says:

> I hoped to get the pension that I put in a claim for before this, but have not. I do not know as they will allow it at all. The testimony that we have sent them is good as far as it goes, but we cannot get all that we could have got years ago. The medical testimony is lacking in a measure on account of the death of physicians that we employed, but I think we have sent enough to satisfy them that the claim is a just one. My husband died in consequence of losing his health in the Army. He had a long sickness, recovered a little, but not to be able to labor, then died from weakness in consequence of his long sickness. Three of the children were too young to take care of themselves. I had very little to do with, but did not think then of a pension, but now when so many are getting I think I have as good a right as many others. I do not know as you can do anything in this matter, but if you could see the agent it might do some good, and if it will not be too much trouble write me and I shall feel truly grateful to you.

Mr. President, the men who are to get and who are getting the money paid for arrears did not think of a pension instantaneously when they were mustered out of the service; they did not concern themselves with things of that kind then. The thought came at a later period, and to a large majority of them it has come reluctantly.

I know that to be the case in hundreds of instances which have come within my own knowledge. Men have waited from time to time hoping that their fortunes would improve, hoping that their health would be better, but finally they have come to realize that their fortunes have not improved, that their health has grown constantly worse, and now broken in health and fortune the pittance the Government owes them is their only remaining resource in many cases, the only thing that can save them from want.

Mr. President, the spectacle of a man who has served his country faithfully in a time of great peril, at the risk of his life and at the sacrifice of his health, is not one which ought to exist under a Government which is able to respond to the obligations it is under to him. The Government ought to stand in the attitude not of reluctantly yielding to his solicitation but of inviting him to receive. It ought to be understood all the while that the Government is only too anxious to discharge the obligations it is under to him, and it ought not to have anywhere in any bureau or in any Department of this Government where his righteous claim is pending any one authorized or required to pass on such claim who deems it to be a duty to view this claimant with suspicion, to act as the attorney of the Government in resisting and if possible rejecting the claim. I do not say that in reference to the administration of the Pension Bureau under the present Commissioner. I speak of it generally in reference to the sentiment that has gone abroad adverse to the applicants for pensions. I say nothing about the Commissioner; he has done what he believed to be his duty, I have no doubt; and while I dissent from some of the methods or contrivances which he has adopted for the purpose of ascertaining who were entitled to pensions, at the same time I give to him the credit which I would claim for myself under similar circumstances.

But I come back to this point, that with a man who is indorsed here as a person competent for the position, under a law whose administration he has entire control of, these cases accumulate, and are still accumulating, and will continue so to do for years to come. This ought not to be. We may not be able to relieve his docket, if I may so call it, to the extent we ought, but we can at least manifest our good-will by increasing the force which may be applied to the examination of these claims and the determination whether an applicant in a given case is entitled to a pension. That we ought to do. I have great faith that additional examiners and clerks will bring some relief, and that it is better to do this than to try a new experiment upon all the pending cases, the result of which cannot be foretold.

Many of the applicants under the administration of the law as it now is carried on will die inevitably before their cases can be reached. That I say would be a shame. It is a disgrace to this Government that it is not prepared by proper machinery and proper appliances of whatever kind necessary to take up these cases promptly and dispose of them, so as to be able to say to a man whether he is entitled to a pension under the law or not. These men were willing to die in the service of their country, they were willing to die and willing to be forgotten if necessary, in order that the country might live. But they are not willing to die now on account of poverty which came from their service, on account of disease and wounds which came of that service, while a rich, prosperous, and powerful Government, growing richer every day, boasting itself of its riches, and prosperity, is lavishing its resources in the payment of one class of its creditors and higgling as to whether it shall pay the obligation cemented by the blood of the men who saved it from destruction. We may have to determine between these two classes of men, not as to ultimate payment, but as to preference in time of payment.

The soldiers accepted $16 a month for their service, in a currency which one day was 60 per cent. discount and on the next was 200; and they made no complaint. Another class of men served the Government by taking bonds, which they paid for at sixty cents on the dollar; and they have been repaid twice over. I do not object to that. I am glad that the obligations of the Government sell as high in the markets of the world as those of any other government. But while it is to the credit of the Government that it has paid its legal obligations to the men who loaned it money, so long as there is anywhere underneath the folds of its flag a single man to whom the debt due by reason of military service rendered in the war of the rebellion remains unpaid, that credit will not be as high as it ought to be; its escutcheon will be tarnished, and we shall present the spectacle of a nation that has forgotten its obligations to the men who were willing to take the musket, were willing to sacrifice not only home and property, but life as well, in order that it might save more dollars to return to the men who while they took out with one hand to lend to the Government put largely into the pocket with the other by means of contracts and other opportunities for making rich which the war brought them.

If we make a distinction, let us make it in favor of those whose service was most valuable, and which involved sacrifice. If we are not to make distinctions, and we ought not, let us say these beautiful harvests, this great growth and prosperity of which we boast—that all these things, the results flowing from the service of the men whose valor saved the Union from disruption and the country from anarchy, are to be paid to the uttermost farthing.

Let us not wait until these men knock at our doors, till we are shamed by their poverty and awed by their importunity; rather let us say, "We owe you this debt; come and take what the Government has promised to give you; we will put either here in the capital or in other convenient place, as the case may be, every appliance which the law can provide, whereby the justice of your claim and the amount of it may be speedily and freely determined," and the building of more railways and canals, the improvement of more harbors, and the keeping up of an expensive and useless Navy—all these things can well be postponed until this Government does justice to the men who saved it in battle, and who have reaped only poverty and suffering therefrom.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair holds that the amendment is subject to the point of order made against it by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Chair be kind enough——

Mr. INGALLS. Under what rule does the Chair hold that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Rule 27.

Mr. INGALLS. I would like to have that rule read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rule will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

27. All general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, except bills making appropriations for rivers and harbors, which shall be referred to the Committee on Commerce; and no amendment shall be received to any general appropriation bill, the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law——

Mr. INGALLS. Stop there, Mr. Clerk, please. Is not this to carry out the provisions of existing law, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator is dissatisfied with the ruling of the Chair, he may take an appeal.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator is very much dissatisfied. He takes the liberty to appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas appeals from the decision made by the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. HOAR. I desire respectfully to ask the Chair, instead of compelling Senators to vote on the very unpleasant question of an appeal, to submit this matter to the Senate. It seems to me, with great deference to the Chair, that the position of the Senator from Kansas is clearly right. As I understand this amendment, it is simply this: the existing pension law being incapable of being carried out during the current year by the insufficiency of the clerical force provided for that purpose, for the mere and sole purpose of carrying out the provisions of existing law this amendment proposes to provide for the compensation of clerks. It is no increase of an appropriation contained in the bill; it is no new item of appropriation except so far as is expressly excepted in the rule itself; and I believe it is within the discretion of the Chair, instead of making the ruling, to submit the question in this first instance to the Senate, which I beg to ask the Chair to do.

Mr. INGALLS. I withdraw my appeal if that course is desired by the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The appeal is withdrawn, and the Chair will submit the question of order to the Senate.

Mr. TELLER and Mr. ROLLINS. Now let the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The Chief Clerk. At the end of line 17 of the bill it is proposed to insert:

To provide fifty additional examiners for the Pension Office, and the number of clerks for the Pension Office and Adjutant-General's and Surgeon-General's Offices, respectively, necessary to render effective the work of said examiners, the sum of $200,000, to be immediately available.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I suppose the Senator is aware that provision for the employés belongs to the legislative bill. That is the usual course. The whole Pension Office force is provided for in the legislative bill. I suggest to the Senator that that is the proper place for this provision to come. In this bill, according to my recollection, nothing is provided for that pertains to employés, but only the money necessary to pay the pensions.

Mr. PLUMB. I agree that the legislative bill would be the proper place for the permanent increase of the force in the Pension Office; but this is simply for the current year. I hope that by another year we shall be able to devise some plan whereby we can more effectually carry out either the present law or some other law. In the mean time, I say this Congress ought not to adjourn, inasmuch as it has refused to do anything else, without providing ample force for the carrying out of the present law, and this is the proper place for that. It is for the purpose of assisting in expending the money that we here appropriate; and as a matter of propriety (saying nothing about the point of order, which I do not care to discuss) this bill is the place where the amendment ought to be put.

Mr. HOAR. Section 4692 of the General Statutes provides that:

Every person specified in the several classes enumerated in the following section—

Which are the special classes of persons entitled to pensions—shall be placed on the list of invalid pensioners of the United States, and be entitled to receive, for a total disability, or a permanent specific disability, such pension as is hereinafter provided in such cases.

Those persons being entitled as of absolute right under the existing law upon making their proof are deprived of those pensions, and will be during the current year, unless an adequate clerical force to receive, examine, and act upon their cases is provided. Now, I hold that no case can be stated of a provision within the exception of this rule stronger than that. If it were desired to find a clear, unmistakable illustration of the exemption contained in the rule to carry out that provision of law, here it is; and this is the only mode in which it can be carried out without new general legislation, which the Senate has ruled out of order. If that be true, then I submit to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that it is not wise to insist on his technical objection that this amendment ought to be placed upon another bill and not on this. The whole discussion of the subject, which has extended over four or five days, so ample, so thorough, so able, has gone on upon this bill. Why should not the Senate therefore follow its debate by its decision and place upon the pending bill, instead of some other bill which would require the entire reconsideration of the whole question, these provisions which are necessary?

I desire to say that I do not see how any Senator can have listened to the eloquent speech of the honorable Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB,] how any Senator can read day by day the appeals which come to him from widows, from dying men, from brave men who went into the service able to perform all the duties of citizens, and who, by reason of the service they rendered their country, have been obliged to sit down at their own table and in their own dwelling dependent objects of bounty and care, instead of being the sources of bounty and care as they were to wife and children in their families—the appeals from these men that poverty, the almshouse, the grave is approaching because of the failure of this Government to perform its promise—I do not see how any Senator can seek to postpone for a single day, for any legislative necessity whatever, this provision.

Sir, I hold for one that the incoming President of the United States would be faithless to his duty, if this Congress should separate without amply providing for this public necessity, if he did not at once reassemble the two Houses of Congress and compel attention to the subject, compel provision to be made. There has not been an occasion for a special session of Congress since the war closed like the occasion which the insisting on such objections as these to a proposition like this will have occasioned.

I trust that the members of this committee, the discussion having gone on as to the proper policy to be pursued with their full assent for days, will not interpose a mere technical objection as to the fit bill to which this provision should be attached.

Mr. WITHERS. Mr. President, I made the point of order to see whether the Senate would determine that question as they determined the preceding one. If the amendment I offered was out of order—and I am compelled to assume that it was as such was the decision of the Senate—it seems to me that the amendment which is now proposed is equally out of order. If the argument is to be held good that because we have a provision of the general statute laws authorizing and requiring the payment of pensioners when their right to a pension shall have been established, therefore any legislation which is proposed in connection with the payment of those pensions must be in order, surely that argument was just as potent when applied to the amendment which I had the honor of submitting to the Senate. If that was legislation upon a general appropriation bill and out of order, this is legislation upon a general appropriation bill and equally out of order. If the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts be correct that because there is an existing law authorizing the payment of pensions, therefore any legislation looking to that end must be in order, the argument was equally efficacious when applied to the amendment which I offered; and I wish to test the sense of the Senate by requiring a vote on the question of order, not under the twenty-seventh rule, but under the twenty-ninth rule, the same point of order which was made against my amendment.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Mr. President, I am still of the opinion that the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas is out of order under Rule 27, and under this clause of that rule:

And no amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill, the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law.

I understand the case provided for in this rule which would not be obnoxious to the provisions of the rule to be this: if Congress had enacted a law which, in order to be carried out, required an appropriation, and had made no appropriation for carrying out that law, then an amendment similar to the one offered by the Senator from Kansas would be in order. But Congress has made an appropriation for carrying out this law——

Mr. HOAR. For next year?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The clerks are provided for now, or will be in some other bill, if they are not already.

Mr. HOAR. Not yet.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I also say it is out of order under Rule 29.

Mr. HOAR. Before my friend passes from Rule 29, do I understand him to say that a bill which provides for fifty clerks instead of forty as contained in the annual appropriation bill last year, which simply increases the number of servants of the same character over those of last year, is out of order under this rule in his judgment? I understand the distinction between the case the Senate just voted upon and this to be that this amendment simply increases the amount of officers under the same mechanism, as ten clerks of the first class instead of eight, or whatever may be the number; the other created new judicial officers; it imposed new rules of law, new methods of procedure, required the creation of a court of surgeons, and so on.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. But the object of the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont was to facilitate the granting of pensions.

Mr. HOAR. But it was not merely to carry into effect an existing law; it was to make a totally new law, to wit: an order for the examination of pensioners, that instead of being in the office here, it should be in the vicinage.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It provided a new system.

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator from Massachusetts must admit that it was to carry out the provision of the law he quoted providing for the payment of pensions. That was the sole object of it.

Mr. HOAR. No, sir; it was more than that. It was to carry out the existing law and to change it, to make a new law.

Mr. WITHERS. No, sir; it was to make new regulations for carrying out the very law which the Senator from Massachusetts quoted.

Mr. HOAR. My friend will pardon me one moment. The proposition which the Senate voted down changed and repealed the existing law by ordering that hereafter there should be examinations of the cases of pensioners in the vicinage where they reside by a newly created board, whose mechanism, whose method of proceeding, whose place of action, and whose rule of proceeding were to be newly created, thereby largely abrogating the existing law and doing a great deal more than carrying it out. This proposition simply is that whereas one hundred clerks distributed among these various offices to carry out the existing law without a change prove inadequate, there shall hereafter be one hundred and fifty. That is all. I hold that this proposition is nothing but that.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I will supply right there what he was talking about in section 10 of the proposition that was before the Senate reported by the Senator from Virginia. That section provided:

> Sections 4744, 4771, 4772, 4773, 4774, 4775, and 4777 of the Revised Statutes are hereby repealed, to take effect June 30, 1880.

The sections thus repealed are every particle of law existing in reference to the machinery of allowing a pension.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. Every particle of law that exists for that purpose. It repeals the whole of it.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose the question should be put to any Senator by a constituent, if this passes, Have you changed the pension law this year at all? The answer would be no, so far as this amendment goes; we have merely provided a larger number of clerks to carry it into effect. Suppose, on the other hand, the same question had been put to the Senator from Virginia, if his amendment had been adopted. The answer would have been, Yes, we have entirely changed it; we have entirely abrogated it, in the particulars which the Senator from Illinois states.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President, I submit that where increases of clerks of any kind are required they should be provided for in the legislative appropriation bill. It is very unusual, and I believe without precedent, to increase the clerical force of any of the offices, except upon that appropriation bill, which will only be a few days delayed. I understand the legislative bill has already been reported to the House.

Now, as to the necessity for this so far as I know no person having authority in any of the Departments has asked for an increase. The Committee on Appropriations, I believe, uniformly have given the Pension Bureau all the employés they have asked for. I believe that has been uniformly the case.

Mr. VOORHEES. Let me ask the Senator from West Virginia if it might not be barely possible that the Department may be deficient in not asking for sufficient clerical force. In my judgment they have not nearly enough, and it is greatly to their blame that they do not ask and demand enough to keep up the business of the office. It is no argument to me to say that the Pension Bureau and the Interior Department have not asked for clerical force, when we know that a quarter of a million of claims are lying there, and men and women and children are crying over the delay, who ought to be relieved.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It may not be an argument to my friend from Indiana, yet it happens to be a very proper one to me. I believe we are governed generally, and our rules tell us we should be governed, by the estimates of the Departments as to the employés they need. I cannot well see how you can get away from those estimates in such matters. Now, as to the question of order: we provide for paying everybody in the service. For instance, soldiers on the frontier; there are provisions in the statutes to pay them; but would it be in order on the Army bill to increase the number of clerks or the number of paymasters to a thousand in order to make those payments? None of us would agree to that. The salary that each Senator gets and that every employé around here receives is paid under appropriations made in accordance with law; but would it be proper to amend an appropriation bill to say that our Secretary's office should have twenty employés more for that purpose? It is clearly out of order, in my judgment, though I do not make very much of a point of that, as my own impression is that the Pension Office has all the employés it can properly work.

As to the Pension Commissioner not doing his duty, as has been intimated, I think that is a great mistake. I have been thrown in contact with the Commissioner of Pensions more than once lately, and I believe he is honest, conscientious, and competent, and is trying to do his duty fully and completely. I think it would be a great injustice both to the Commissioner and to the Department of the Interior to intimate anything else.

I do not see that the proposed increase of force is necessary, even if the proposition were in order; but it is out of order on the ground that there is no estimate of the Department, there is no law that authorizes the increase, and I think the former occupant of the chair was clearly right when he ruled it out of order for more than one reason.

Mr. TELLER. It does not appear to be imperative to the officer to expend this money. If we give him the $200,000, and he does not need it, he may not expend it. I do not suppose there is anybody here who has had dealings with the Pension Office who does not know that additional help is needed in that office. It is very possible that the terror of the Committee on Appropriations has been so great over him that he has not dared to ask for all he needs.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. So far as the Committee on Appropriations are concerned they have always said to that particular bureau, though there may be others who have such a terror, that we would give them all they asked. It is not the Commissioner of Pensions, it is the Secretary of the Interior who makes the estimates.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly, I understand that.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. He is the person to talk to and not the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. TELLER. I understand very well that the Secretary of the Interior makes the estimate, but he makes it usually on the suggestion of the Commissioner. It is apparent that they need two things in that Department; one is more help, and another a higher class of men than they have been enabled by the appropriation allowed to employ. You employ a clerk for $900 a year and set him there to do the most important thing that can be done, and that is to judge of the evidence that comes before him. Why, Mr. President, some of those men are qualified undoubtedly. What we ought to do is to put into the Department a number of educated lawyers, men who can distinguish good evidence from bad.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. But my friend will bear in mind that this amendment will not remedy the evil he now speaks of. I agree with him that there should be more brains in the Department that is to examine these claims. I believe it would be better if we could get them. I believe it would increase the service and do better. This amendment will not reach that.

Mr. TELLER. We propose to give him $200,000 in money. Out of the $200,000 in money he can employ three or four competent men who will have a general supervision of the office. I have received from that office myself letters that have been simply ridiculous. I am not speaking of the Commissioner, for nobody can pretend that he can oversee all the cases. That is an impossibility.

Not long ago, about a year ago, I had occasion to apply to have a pension of a pensioner of the war of 1812 transferred to his widow; and what was the request made of that old woman? They said her papers were on file but that she had failed to prove by an eye-witness that she was married to this man. After living with him for fifty years this was exacted of her by a clerk; it did not come to the attention of the Commissioner; some clerk would not pass the case unless she proved in that way that she was his wife, that she had been married actually. They wanted an eye-witness, the minister or somebody who stood by. When I called the attention of the Commissioner to it, of course he said that was ridiculous, and he provided for other evidence, and the case was allowed.

Not long ago I had occasion to receive a letter from some parties in Western New York where I formerly lived, saying that an old lady whose son had been killed early in the war was an applicant for a pension. Her pension claim had been filed sixteen years before, and there it had lain and waited, and this old woman had lived in poverty the whole time, making her living by knitting and other methods, a woman who I think was, when her pension was allowed, nearly eighty years of age. I went and had the case examined and another clerk said to me as to the matter of this boy that had been killed in 1863 in battle, her youngest boy, "We want the affidavit of somebody that was present at the accouchement." The idiotic clerk who had examined that case made that a necessity, and therefore he had pigeonholed the case and it had been pigeon-holed there for years because that kind of testimony was not produced. Hundreds of people could have come up and sworn that this boy was this woman's son, that he had lived in the family and that they knew this woman as his mother, and yet there was not perhaps a single person living who had been present at his birth.

I say you want some men who will review these cases, and who when an incompetent clerk passes upon them and makes such a ruling can say, "That is nonsense; we will not require that kind of evidence." This old woman, after waiting sixteen years or thereabout, if I recollect, for her pension, got the enormous sum of $1,200, and she would not have got anything but the bare pittance that was allowed a soldier's mother, if it had not been for the arrears-of-pensions bill, against which so much has been said here within the last few days.

I think this amendment is not amenable to the question of order. I think it is in order, and I think it is eminently proper and it ought to be put on the bill. As was said by the Senator from Kansas, what difference does it make whether we pay for these examinations this year all at once, or whether we spread them out for five or ten years; I mean what difference does it make to the Government? It makes a great difference to these pensioners. I do not care, as the Senator from Kansas has said, if it costs fifty million dollars, or a hundred million, or a thousand million. We have agreed to do it, now let us get at it and find out what we owe to these men, and let us have their cases adjudicated on, and if they are proper let us have them allowed; if they are not, let us have them rejected, and the time will come when we can close up this business of examining claims.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, may I ask the Chair whether the question before the Senate is a question of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. GARLAND in the chair.) The question is whether the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] is in order or not?

Mr. EATON. Then I do not propose to discuss anything else except the question of order. While I agree with my friend from Kansas that this measure should pass to give the bureau of the Commissioner of Pensions additional help, I do not think it is in order upon this bill. Clearly in my judgment it is new legislation. If the bill passes, and the Senate know and the bureau know exactly what force they require, every Senator will vote to give that bureau all the clerical force that is necessary, as we always have done; therefore I will not discuss the other matter. If I did I should say a word in favor of this present Commissioner. So far as I know, he has done his duty faithfully and well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is whether the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] is in order or not?

Mr. PLUMB called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I am very anxious that this provision shall be made or something like it, as I was anxious that the amendment reported from the Committee on Pensions should be received for consideration and after being put into a shape that would obviate sundry objections should be adopted. Perhaps I should not say I was anxious for it; but my inclination was to believe that we ought to try the experiment, not of taking everything out of the Pension Office that is there now, but of taking out such part of the cases that had not yet made much progress as would really help to dispose of the business. But I was very much afraid that the other amendment was not in order though I was not here when it was disposed of; and if I am obliged to vote upon this on the mere question of order, I shall be obliged to vote that this is not in order; but I think there is a method if the Senate should decide this not to be in order, whereby we can get at it still without any objection of order. That is all I wish to say.

Mr. DAWES. The original bill proposes the expenditure of a large sum of money in the payment of pensions, and the amendment provides a method of expending that money. I never knew before in my experience——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. This is an additional appropriation of $200,000, and has nothing to do with the expenditure of money already in the bill.

Mr. DAWES. I do not think that makes any difference. In order to provide for the better expenditure of the money appropriated by the bill, beginning and ending with that money, it is proposed to pay additional clerks for doing it. If this is not a limitation, a prescription of the mode and manner of expending the money appropriated in the original bill, I fail to see what it is. It applies to the appropriation in the original bill; and the fact that it is necessary to pay these men more money does not make it out of order. Suppose that the amendment had been in this form——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I know my friend, who has had much experience with appropriation bills, will understand that the money proposed, $200,000, does not apply to the appropriations in this bill, because this bill appropriates for the coming year, and these clerks are asked for the current year. The Senator understands that, of course.

Mr. DAWES. I understand that these clerks are to be set at work.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Immediately.

Mr. DAWES. When this bill takes effect, and it is in order to carry out the existing appropriations in this bill that this additional machinery is employed, I do not see but that in substance it will be simply this: there is so much money appropriated, provided that it be expended in the manner and through the instrumentality set forth in the amendment. That is always allowable.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. But my friend will see that the appropriation of $200,000 for clerical force is for the current year, "immediately available," while the appropriation in the bill is for the year to come, for the next fiscal year.

Mr. DAWES. I understand these clerks are to be employed in deciding to whom this money appropriated in this bill shall go.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. My friend will understand that this bill, as I have stated once or twice, takes effect on the 1st day of July next. The amendment for the employment of this additional force takes effect immediately and runs up to the time the bill commences.

Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator from West Virginia understand that these clerks are to stop operations on the 1st of July?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. No obligation, as far as this amendment goes, carries them beyond next July, for it says "to be available immediately" this year, the current year, not the year to come.

Mr. DAWES. But it does not say it shall cease to take effect on 1st of July.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. But my friend understands well that an appropriation at the end of the year falls unless the expenditure is made during the year.

Mr. DAWES. The money already appropriated it is found impracticable to expend according to existing law without this additional force, in the opinion of those who offer this amendment. This money if it begins and ends with this year, then, is just as clearly money appropriated to carry out existing provisions as it would be if it took effect on the 1st of July to direct the mode of expending the future appropriation. There is no mystery about it. It is a method of expending the money we appropriate under existing law to carry out the existing law. We provide by law and make appropriation for the construction of a vessel for the Navy, and we find it necessary to provide a naval constructor six months afterward it may be, or six more carpenters. Does it make any difference whether we provide the naval constructor six months afterward or provide for him when we make the appropriation? It is for the purpose of carrying out the existing law that we supply this method.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not desire to discuss this question of order, but I do desire to call attention to a matter which has not been mentioned. In all the discussion on either side in reference to this proposition no attention has been drawn to one matter in connection with the allowing of pensions. It makes no difference what kind of machinery or how much of it you have for allowing pensions while the law requires a certificate from the Surgeon-General coming from some hospital, or from the Adjutant-General in reference to the record of the soldier while in the Army, unless sufficient force is provided to furnish that. The Pension Office cannot go on any faster than it gets these certificates. As I said, it makes no difference about the machinery; all the machinery that has been talked about, the proposition that has passed by, and all else that you might frame, would not expedite it unless you furnish the force here in Washington City to examine these records and furnish them to the Commissioner of Pensions. I know the fact that in the Surgeon-General's Office the records are not classified as in my judgment they ought to be; the force has never been sufficient to rearrange and classify and fix them so that they can be examined in a moment to see whether a man was sick or not, and sometimes it is a month before that information is received by the Pension Office, and this is one of the great delays. All that is necessary in reference to the present machinery is to make it ample.

This amendment is of similar character to the one I suggested in my argument and was going to propose; but when it was proposed by the Senator from Kansas, of course that superseded the necessity of my proposition. I think the Senate ought to adopt it, and it ought to attach it to this bill for the purpose of affording the facilities which are necessary; and with this, in my judgment, there is nothing more necessary and nothing more that could advance the interests of pensioners. The law is ample if this addition is made.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I have no doubt that this amendment is in order under the rule; but a somewhat long experience in connection with the administration of the pension system of this Government leads me to doubt its efficiency. The delay and the procrastination in the adjustment of cases and their enormous accumulation, the congestion of business that has occurred in that office, are due to the inherent vices of the system, and I do not believe that those vices can be remedied by any addition to the present force employed under the Commissioner. The difficulty is here: this pension business is a matter of contract; it is a debt which the Government owes to those persons entitled to claim pensions under existing statutes; consequently, the determining of what individual shall by evidence bring himself within the provisions of the statutes and show himself entitled to be placed upon the roll is a judicial function purely. The great trouble underlying our whole system is, that you intrust judicial functions to executive officers. These men are appointed by the Government; they are paid by the Government; they are responsible to the Government; they can be discharged by the Government. Consequently their interests are thoroughly identified with the Government; and unconsciously and involuntarily they become the partisans of the Government to such an extent that they become antagonistic to the pensioner; and the question they ask themselves is, not what are the reasons for which this pension should be allowed, but what are the reasons that we can discover why this pension should be rejected. And that is the reason why there has been so much procrastination and delay in the adjudication of pension causes; and my belief is, and my fear is, that additional clerks will prove merely an additional obstruction. As it is now, after a case has been made out to the satisfaction of any man who would be impartial between the Government and the pensioner, the clerks and examiners who have the matter in charge devote themselves to further efforts to delay and retard: they call for this evidence upon this point, and for that evidence upon that point, and finally hang it up and lay it away and pigeon-hole it indefinitely, in the vain hope that something may be discovered upon which the pension may not be finally allowed, but finally rejected.

Now, Mr. President, so long as these functions essentially judicial in their character are intrusted to executive officers, just so long you will have trouble with the difficulties that annoy and harass us to-day. Our pension list is already the second largest, I think, in the budget. It is an extraordinary fact that we are paying to-day more for pensions than we are paying for the support of the Army and Navy combined; and instead of being diminished, if the present pensions claims shall be properly adjudicated the amount is to be annually increased until if my computations are right—and I have, as I said from long familiarity with this subject, devoted great attention to it—I believe that before the claims now upon the list are adjusted the annual pension-roll will reach $100,000,000, and will finally settle back to about forty-five million dollars, at which point it will be maintained for a great number of years—not in consequence of additions to the roll by what is called the arrears-of-pensions act, for that added nobody. There has been studious and persistent misapprehension and misrepresentation about that subject. The arrears-of-pensions act added nobody to the roll; it simply removed an arbitrary, illogical, and unjust limitation by which the pension was to date from the time of the filing of the last paper necessary to establish the claim, thereby placing every man's claim at the caprice of the Commissioner, and said as the law of 1862 said that when a man was wounded or disabled in the service of his country so as to entitle him to a pension, that pension should be paid him from the date of the disability.

There has been much denunciation of the arrears-of-pensions act. It has been denounced as the act of demagogues, as a piece of sentimentalism; and we have had repeated calls from the press and from other sources for some man who would become responsible for the act, as if there was some turpitude about it. Mr. President, I introduced the arrears-of-pensions act first in 1876. I repeated it in 1878. I was chairman of the committee that reported it to the Senate. I moved its consideration in January, 1879, and insisted upon action until it was finally passed. It was an act of justice that had been long delayed; and if public indignation is looking for a victim I offer myself in that capacity; and I hope until some man or some Senator or some member of the House of Representatives who denounces this as an act of demagogism has the intrepidity and the temerity to offer some bill repealing the arrears-of-pensions act we shall hear no more about its injustice or about its demagogism. It was an act of simple justice; it was carrying out the plighted faith of the nation; and whether it gives $50,000,000 this year or $100,000,000 or $500,000,000 is not the question. It does not become men when they owe a debt to stand around grumbling about the amount of it; and I have never heard that a statute of limitations paid a debt. In imposing a statute of limitations upon the pension act the United States Government did an act unworthy of itself. In private life a man who would plead the statute of limitations to a debt otherwise acknowledged to be honest would be regarded as little better than a thief, certainly not a man of honor; and the arrears-of-pensions act was merely removing an invidious, illogical, unreasonable, and arbitrary limitation.

It has been said here that the figures upon this subject have been exaggerated, that we should ultimately pay something more perhaps than $500,000,000 of pensions. I do not think they have been exaggerated. I believe we have already paid something near five hundred million dollars in pensions since 1861, and I have no doubt that under the operation, not of the arrears-of-pensions act, but under the operation of the pension acts of the Government paying a just debt and an obligation to those of the 2,800,000 men who enlisted in defense of this country, we shall ultimately pay perhaps $600,000,000 or $700,000,000; but that is not in consequence of the arrears-of-pensions act, but in consequence of the pension act of 1862, because the arrears-of-pensions act placed no man upon the roll who was not there before; no man could get upon the list of pensioners by virtue of that act unless he brought himself strictly within the provisions of law entitling him to a pension.

But, sir, I did not intend to be betrayed into any consideration of the general subject of pensions. I merely meant to say when I rose that the amendment offered by my colleague, [Mr. PLUMB,] while it is, as I believe, proposed with the best design, yet with the theory that I entertain of the present condition of the pension system, will be ineffectual and an obstruction rather than a benefit to the present system, because until we have separated the judicial functions of the Government in this matter from the executive functions, until we have reposed in men appointed for that purpose who shall not be partisans of the Government the function of deciding who shall be entitled to a pension and what they shall receive, you will always have the same difficulty that exists to-day. Instead of endeavoring to find out reasons why men shall be placed on the roll, they will be endeavoring to find out reasons why they should be rejected.

And in regard to the Commissioner of Pensions, before I sit down I desire to say this: while I do not sympathize in any particular with the animadversions that have been made upon him, I think he is a conspicuous and shining example of the vices that taint our present system of administration. If he had devoted himself to the practical business question of how the 350,000 claims that are pending upon these rolls should be determined and decided, instead of indulging in theories and systematic efforts to invent a new fabric of administration, we should have had less to complain of than we have to-day. But he is there as the representative of this vicious system; he is identified with the Government, and to that extent he is the antagonist of the pensioner; and if our system of pensions had been administered upon the same plan and with the same vigor and energy that characterizes the administration of any great business enterprise in this country, a railroad, a shop, a mine, or a factory, it would not be necessary for him to have said, as he has said in his last report, which is one of the most tragic utterances that ever fell from any official, that while these matters have been pending thousands upon thousands of members of the Army and Navy who were entitled to pensions have died without obtaining relief.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President——

Mr. THURMAN. Will my friend give me the floor to move an executive session?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I hope we shall be allowed to finish this bill. We have been at it several days. I think we are about ready to take a vote.

Mr. THURMAN. If so, I shall not make the motion.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I am not surprised that the Senators who placed obstacles in the way of the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Virginia should seek some other amendment to rectify their mistake. The men who raised that point of order are now very anxious indeed that something should be done to hasten the handling of pension claims. I favored the amendment of the Senator from Virginia because I believed it would expedite the examination of pension claims. I believed the pensioners would be brought in contact with agents of the Government occupying a judicial position as suggested by the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS,] and I thought that would very greatly expedite the settlement of their applications. But I do not believe that this increase of force which is contemplated by this amendment will answer that purpose. In fact I believe very much as the Senator from Kansas does, that it will simply clog the wheels of the bureau. There is too much of that kind of machinery altogether.

The gentlemen who put themselves on account of their parliamentary views as an obstacle in the way of the amendment of the Senator from Virginia have in my opinion done the pensioners of this country and the pension applicants a very great wrong, and it will be seen at a future day that they have done that wrong. I believe that three-fourths of the members of the Senate are favorable to the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, or a greater majority even than that; and yet a few men who think they know more than a large majority of the Senate put themselves in the way of that amendment on a parliamentary technicality, and I think they have done the pensioners a very great wrong, and the Government also.

I just wanted to put myself on record upon that question. Now, I can see no difference between this amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] and the amendment of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. WITHERS] in a parliamentary point of view. This authorizes the employment of an additional number of clerks, and the amendment of the Senator from Virginia authorized the appointment of an additional number of officers. They are both for the same purpose, that is to carry out the pension law, to expedite the granting of pensions. I believe they are both in order, and I voted that the amendment of the Senator from Virginia was in order, and I am ready to vote that this amendment is in order; but I shall vote against the amendment on its merits, because I do not believe it is the most effective way to produce the result which we sought to produce by the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not care to detain the Senate; but we might as well talk to some practical effect. I am not willing, so far as I am concerned, to let the question go on the opinion of the Commissioner of Pensions or the Secretary of the Interior, because I have an opinion of my own about it, and I think the Senate ought to have an opinion of its own, too, and it ought not to be compelled, or it ought not to be willing even, to accept simply what may be said by the Department without seeking information elsewhere. We are under a responsibility in this matter. Here is what everybody concedes to be a public scandal. Now, the Senator from Rhode Island says in effect that captiously the amendment moved by the Senator from Virginia has been beaten, and that this is something that is designed to cover the retreat. I did not participate in the discussion on Senate bill No. 496 at all, because I thought I knew how that question was going to be decided, and I did not want to take up time; but I do not believe any candid man, who will look carefully at that bill and observe how everything is required to come back for the supervision and the control and management of the Commissioner of Pensions, will be able to put his hand on his heart and say that that simplifies the business at all. It only substituted two hundred and ninety-three traveling courts for what may now be three hundred thousand traveling courts.

Mr. EATON. I will not interpose a question of order while my friend from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] is on the floor; but I give notice that after he gets through I will interpose the question of order. I insist that this whole discussion is entirely out of order, just as much as I think the amendment is out of order.

Mr. PLUMB. I presume it may have been out of order technically speaking, but the question is not out of order at all events. Whether the debate be out of order or not is perhaps immaterial; but the question itself is not out of order. This question of order will be more in order on the 1st of July than it is now, and on the 1st day of next January it will be the overshadowing thing if we do not do something. My colleague says—and I have great deference for his judgment, because he is as well posted as any one in regard to the methods of doing business in that office—he is satisfied or fears that the addition of clerks will be an obstruction to business. We do not compel the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of Pensions to take these clerks if that be the fact; but it will be an expression of the will of the Senate in the first place, and of Congress, that something shall be done. It is recognition of the magnitude of this issue.

I am not willing either to say that the present Commissioner of Pensions is the only man in the United States who can handle two hundred examiners and a corresponding number of clerks. If we give these clerks we shall have more business transacted in the office, and suppose it is only a small percentage of the amount which ought to be transacted, it is still a step in the right direction, and it is superior in my judgment to the bill which was offered by the Pensions Committee, especially for sparsely settled sections of the country. One single district in my State has over forty counties in it. It would not be possible for any court traveling to hold sufficient sessions in any of the counties in that district to transact the business with any degree of speed whatever. That court would have to wait for the instructions of the Commissioner of Pensions at every step. As to the taking of testimony elsewhere in regard to cases pending before the court in any county, it could not act except upon his request, and so on. Everything would have to be drawn through that one conduit, and that would have been sufficient to obstruct it just as completely as the business is obstructed now.

I believe that by the adoption of this amendment, if it shall be adopted, we shall arrive at a more rapid disposition of these cases. I believe it will be regarded as mandatory on the Commissioner of Pensions—if not by the present Commissioner, then by the new one—to dispose of this business more rapidly. I think myself it is the least the Senate can do as an expression of its judgment on that which has become not only a scandal but a great wrong.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 31, nays 24; as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is decided to be in order. The question now is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I move that the Senate adjourn. It is too late to go into executive session now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 7, 1881.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. SPEER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPEER. Mr. Speaker, in the RECORD of Saturday's proceedings I find that my colleague, Mr. HAMMOND, has reflected on me, and has misinterpreted and misstated a brief statement made by me that day on the electoral count joint resolution. The gentleman was pleased to say, as it appears from the RECORD:

> I regret that my colleague from Georgia [Mr. SPEER] should arraign the rest of us, both of his State and of his party, for an alleged dereliction in duty, in order to justify what some have thought to be his violation of party allegiance and fealty. It may be a subject of congratulation to him that in his estimation now the tail wags the dog. Let it be so—said the gentleman with infinite condescension.

When the gentleman from whom I quote accomplished this deliverance, on Saturday last, I was not aware that he alluded to me. My name was not mentioned by him, but it is inserted in the RECORD. I presumed that his animadversion was directed at another colleague, who had that day in some way charged Georgia officials with dereliction of duty.

His remarks as applicable to me were unprovoked and were unparliamentary to a degree of coarseness. I had not arraigned anybody for a "dereliction of duty." Nothing I had said could be construed into such an arraignment. It is true that I had differed with my colleague on the Morgan joint resolution, and I simply expressed that difference, and claimed that the resolution adopted by the House on Saturday was entirely satisfactory to me. I mentioned also that I, together with my colleagues who voted against the first resolution, had been criticised by the partisan press.

But, sir, I repeat that I said nothing which could be construed, even by the most irritable and querulous, into an arraignment of anybody for a dereliction of duty. A gentleman of discrimination can easily recognize a difference of opinion entirely consistent with the highest sense of duty in all the parties concerned. And so, sir, it is my privilege to say that my colleague has placed a construction on my remarks which is most unwarrantable. And, sir, the gentleman did not stop there. While he was up he took occasion to regale the House with a choice selection from his repertoire of other people's satire, at the expense of those of us in Georgia who have the temerity to dissent from his notions of proper party methods.

> I desire—

Said he, with classical playfulness—

> as I am in the line of quoting authorities, in reply to the suggestion of the gentleman that the independent is always right and everybody else is wrong, to quote a declaration from Coke's Institutes, made many years ago of course.
> Lord Coke in the Fourth Institute draws a parallel between a useful member of Parliament—one possessed of all "properties a Parliament man should have"—and the Solomon of the bestial world, to wit, the elephant. "Every member of the House," he says, "being a counselor, should have three properties of the elephant: first, that he hath no gall; secondly, that he is inflexible and cannot bow; thirdly, that he is of a most ripe and perfect memory." * * * We will add two other properties of the elephant—the one that the elephant is philanthropos, h mini erranti viam ostendit—a philanthropist who showed the wanderer his road—

Said the gentleman, handsomely translating the dead tongue for those whom Sydney Smith would call the "Agricolous members."

> The other, that though they be maximæ virtutis et maximi intellectus, of greatest strength and understanding—

Again translating—

> tamen gregatim semper incedunt—

And here the gentleman supplies, with much liberality, his final translation—> yet they are sociable and go in companies.

> Sociable creatures that go in flocks or herds are not hurtful, as deer, sheep, &c., but beasts that walk solely or singularly, as bears, foxes, &c., are dangerous and hurtful. [Great laughter.] And these properties ought every Parliament man to have." (Heard's Curiosities of the Law Reporters, page 183.)

Now, sir, I made no such suggestion as that he imputes to me. I did not suggest that the independent is always right. I simply maintained, as it was entirely proper and legitimate for me to do, that I was right on the particular question mentioned and about which I have been criticised. I confess, too, Mr. Speaker, that whenever I had been in the habit of regarding the shapely intellectual and physical proportions of my colleague I had never detected so many points of similitude between him and the lordly elephant. Indeed, sir, I have seen nothing of the elephant in his make-up. Those who know him best will, however, recognize some of the attributes which Lord Coke mentions. He has no gall. Not he. He is inflexible and cannot bow. The elephant too, I may remark, is no inexpert trumpeter—for himself. But since the gentleman has humorously likened me to the solitary species of the ferœ naturæ, I will be pardoned for saying that there are gregarious and sociable animals which, to my mind, much more vigorously suggest and typify the gentleman than the elephant, whose characteristics he would emulate. There, sir, stands that native-born American citizen, Guliellmus capricornus. He too is gregarious, and while the elephant, I beg pardon, the gentleman from Georgia, would be but a baby elephant in a herd of these sociable mammals, he might most readily be mistaken for a patriarch of distinction in society with the sportive and frolicsome goat. And so let me in this way gently suggest to the gentleman that his gregarious illustration is not always felicitous.

Mr. HATCH. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HATCH. I insist that this is not a question of privilege.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I hope the gentleman will not be interrupted. Please let him proceed.

Mr. HATCH. I must insist upon my point of order in the interest of the legislation of the country.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman is going beyond the limits of a mere question of personal privilege.

Mr. SPEER. I am replying to remarks the gentleman has seen proper to make about me.

Mr. Speaker, my colleague has intimated that the arraignment which he alleges me to have attempted was in order to justify what some have thought to be a violation of party allegiance and fealty by me. The gentleman is as far wrong here as he is when he charged me with accusing people of a dereliction of duty. I owe to party no fealty or allegiance which controls either my judgment or my sense of public duty. I am not sensitive upon that subject. I have differed with the majority of the party, not because I arrogated to myself any superiority, but, sir, I am entitled to my opinion, and do not choose to surrender my convictions.

Sir, I seek to justify my public conduct to no tribunal save the enlightened public sentiment of my State, and while I have differed with my colleague as widely heretofore as I do now, I have as yet no occasion to be chagrined with the judgments of that tribunal.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman's comment this morning upon what I said on Saturday does me injustice——

Mr. NEW. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that we may have order in the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state to the gentleman that, as the end of the session approaches, he hopes, in the interest of the transaction of public business, that order may be maintained upon the floor.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I repeat, sir, that the comment of the gentleman this morning has done me, in some slight particulars, as much injustice as he claims I did him. Personally I could not on this floor have so far forgotten myself and the respect due to this House as to have been guilty of an unparliamentary assault upon him or any unparliamentary conduct. If I believed that my colleague was coarse in any allusion which he made, I would not say so in this presence. I have regarded him always as my personal friend. I have supped at his grandfather's table and also at his father's table, and have known him intimately from his very boyhood, and I, in common with all the people of the State of Georgia, congratulate the country upon possessing one of his extensive learning and very great brain.

But, Mr. Speaker, great men may err. The most distinguished individual may do wrong, and it may be that the gentleman himself erred on Saturday. I will justify my conduct by citing the motive which actuated me at that time, and see whether or not I am subject to the criticism which he makes this morning.

The democratic party had tried to pass—after a fashion at least, seemed to be trying to pass—a joint resolution. [Laughter on the republican side.] I may say that it seemed a feint. I have no doubt of that. The gentleman from Georgia did not seem to understand that feint, and he voted against his party. We were just before twitted by the honorable gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] (who always does such things decently and very pointedly also) with having violated the old landmarks of constitutional liberty as understood by the democracy. He certainly arraigned our party; he certainly intended to make his arraignment pointed; and when the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SPEER] arose and said "the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] did some of us injustice when he said that none on this side dared to stand forth and speak for what we understood to be true democracy against this Morgan joint resolution," and added "there were three of us over here who did that thing, and our votes are found recorded against it," I understood him to mean that which the gentleman from New Jersey had uttered, that none but three—as Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, [laughter and applause]—none of this grand democratic party but three had dared to utter what they believed to be true democratic principles. He went further, and said:

> And I congratulate my brethren of the democratic party that we have reached a solution of this question upon which we can agree, and which will not do violence to those grand rights of the sovereign States for which I thought I was speaking when I voted against that joint resolution which took the power from the States and vested it in Congress.

Is not that necessarily pregnant with the idea that when we, the democrats, voted the other way we were doing violence to those grand rights of the sovereign States to which he refers? He also said:

> This resolution now to be adopted by Congress has speedily justified that vote. I have, sir, been criticised, together with my colleagues who voted against that resolution, by the ultra partisan press. But those criticisms were not due solely to the fact that we voted against the resolution, but also perhaps to the fact that we had antagonized ultra partisan methods in the Empire State of the South. We were right, and I stand to that vote, and I find now, if I mistake not, that all the democracy here are standing shoulder to shoulder with us—> and upon the same line on which we then stood.

That is, "us three"—

Now, Mr. Speaker, before I go on and comment upon that sentence, I wish to refer to the gentleman's remark that I have changed the RECORD by inserting something in it which was not uttered on this floor. I have not done so.

Of course I have nothing to do with the making up of the RECORD, as to the insertion of names in it; and of course every gentleman on this floor who has ordinary intelligence must have understood that I alluded to the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. SPEER, and not to the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. FELTON, in the remarks I made. Mr. FELTON had said nothing to justify the application to him of the idea that in his estimation the tail was wagging the dog. He had said nothing about his difference with the party; he had addressed himself to a question of dereliction of duty on the part of certain officers in Georgia. I could have had no other reference than that to the gentleman, Mr. SPEER.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if I did not behave like the elephant on that occasion, as the gentleman said, in having "no gall," I did not intend to do anything more than to say that I thought it was unkind for the gentleman to arraign his party and to arraign his State. Let me say further there was an additional increment to my feeling in an expression he made use of. The gentleman has changed the RECORD in that particular, and has put in another expression. As soon as the Reporter can supply from his notes the real words the gentleman used it will be seen he uttered no such words as "ultra-partisan methods." He said he was opposed to the "Bourbon party" and the "Bourbon methods of Georgia." He got hold of the slang phrase which the other side is in the habit of throwing in the teeth of this side of the House. And it was that which excited me; I do not know exactly why. I am not sufficiently acquainted with history to know why a man should dislike to be called a "Bourbon" democrat. Possibly the term is used as an antagonism to Jacobin. But at any rate, as it is a slang phrase, uttered by the republican side of the House, I felt it was unkind for a man in our party to take it up and throw it in our teeth.

Mr. ROBESON. When we use that phrase we do not mean Georgia but Kentucky.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I said I had no gall in this thing and only desired to defend myself and party. If I had had any gall I might have suggested an unpleasant criticism on the gentleman. That great Englishman, Charles James Fox, when asked to define an "independent," said he was a man who could not be depended upon. [Laughter.] I did not wish to say anything hard or anything unpleasant. Still, with the idea I had in my mind, if I had desired to be unpleasant, I might have prayed for our party that the gentleman, like Samson's foxes, might have a firebrand attached to his tail, and that he might be sent over among the Philistines for their destruction and the annihilation of himself. [Laughter.] But I simply tried to defend my State and my party from any charge of not being true to the rights of the States, from anything that was implied in any harsh term like Bourbonism.

I need not say, Mr. Speaker, that I have no objection to independence of thought and independence of speech and action. Every true man admires independence everywhere and on all occasions. But I wish to make this remark, that the truly independent man needs not to protrude his independence on the world. The world will find it out.

The truly independent man may march as well in column with his party as outside his party; he may differ occasionally with them, but his differences will be the exception and not the rule. I admire true independence—that independence that makes a man stand, when his conscience tells him he must stand, like a rock, even to his death. I admire that independence which made for the church its martyrs, and has made men distinguished in every age as the rightful leaders of mankind. That independence will meet its just reward everywhere. It will give to a man fame, not notoriety.*

Mr. SPEER. I desire to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HAMMOND.] He has now conceded distinctly that that joint resolution, for voting against which he arraigns me as recreant to party allegiance and party fealty, is a feint and a subterfuge. The gentleman concedes it. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. HAZELTON. Let the gentleman go on. Let there be fair play.

Mr. SPEER. I had misunderstood it. I thought it was a serious proposition, and being in earnest myself and conscientiously opposed to it, I voted against it. But the gentleman has not escaped the point which I make upon him when I say that he alleged I charged upon him and the people of the State of Georgia a dereliction of duty. Sir, I did no such thing. It is true I used the expression, "Bourbon press;" but at the suggestion of my friend from Virginia, [Mr. HARRIS,] who objected to the use of that expression, I eliminated the term "Bourbon" and substituted the words "ultra partisan," which I think mean precisely the same thing. The gentleman renews his offensive and unparliamentary remark about the tail wagging the dog.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I ask my friend to let me interrupt him. I know he does not mean to say I suggested to him to keep the expression out of the RECORD. I did suggest that I thought it was unkind in him to apply to our party the term used by the opposite party.

Mr. SPEER. And I accepted the gentleman's suggestion and made the alteration, because I desired to give no offense to my friends on this side of the House by words used in the heat of debate. This is neither unusual here, nor improper.

The gentleman from Georgia again alludes to me as a member of the solitary species of the ferœ naturæ. Mr. Speaker, who is there who will always decry that species; who will decry some of the more elevated members of that species, and rather admire, for instance, the melodious wild ass of the plains, who is a gregarious animal? Does not Æsop tell us that an ass, though gregarious, sought on one occasion to enhance his renown by masquerading in a lion's skin?

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I call for the regular order.

Mr. HAZELTON. I also call for the regular order now.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the Chair, as

*The transcript from the shorthand notes of the official reporter puts this as Mr. SPEER's language:

"I have, sir, been criticised, together with my colleagues who voted against the resolution, by the Bourbon press of Georgia. Those criticisms were not due solely to the fact that we had voted against the resolution, but perhaps also to the fact that we had antagonized Bourbon methods in the Empire State of the South."

required by the rules, will now call the States and Territories in alphabetical order for the presentation of bills and joint resolutions for printing and reference. Under this call joint and concurrent resolutions and memorials of State and territorial Legislatures can be presented and appropriately referred; and resolutions of inquiry directed to heads of the Executive Departments are in order for reference to the appropriate committees, which latter resolutions are to be reported to the House within one week.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order to submit that request during this call. The Chair will recognize the gentleman later for the purpose.

Subsequently the request was renewed and granted.

The joint resolution is as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the Constitution of the United States confers no power upon Congress to impose tariff, internal revenue, or other taxation, except for the purpose of raising revenue.

Second. The revenue standard of taxation is the lowest rate that will yield the required revenue.

Third. To impose a higher tax when a lower one would yield the same amount of revenue is to place an unnecessary burden on the consumers of the taxed articles, which brings no additional return to the Treasury.

Fourth. That neither the State nor Federal Government has or should have the power to impose a tax upon one portion of the people, or the profits of their industries, for the purpose of enabling another portion to engage profitably in a branch of industry which would otherwise be unremunerative.

Fifth. Within the revenue standard, as above defined, Congress may, in the selection of objects for taxation, discriminate with a view to the effect upon American labor and the introduction of agricultural and manufacturing industries.

Sixth. That internal revenue, tariff, and other indirect taxes should be levied upon the luxuries, and not upon the necessaries of life. The chief advantage of indirect over direct taxation is that the payment of the tax is voluntary; but when imposed on articles of prime necessity it ceases to be such.

LAND GRANTS TO TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILROADS.

Mr. McLANE. I ask by unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to present a report from the Auditor of Railroad Accounts, prepared in compliance with my request of June 18, 1880. The report covers all facts connected with the land grants made by the United States to aid in the construction of Pacific railroads. The report has been shaped so as to take up separately each one of the great transcontinental railroads located on the forty-seventh, fortieth, thirty-fifth, and thirty-second parallels of latitude, giving details as to each main and branch line, with a general recapitulation showing the whole result. The report is very interesting, and I ask to have it printed and referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads, and also to have it printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The report is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF AUDITOR OF RAILROAD ACCOUNTS,
Washington, D. C., February 3, 1881.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a report prepared in this office in compliance with your request of June 18, 1880, indorsed on a draught of a resolution which the Committee on Pacific Railroads authorized you to report to the House at its last session, but which in the press of other business was not reached before adjournment.

As the design of the resolution proposed was to ascertain as accurately as possible all facts connected with the land grants made by the United States to aid in the construction of the Pacific railroads, special inquiry has been made in order to obtain the fullest information.

The report has been shaped so as to take up separately each one of the four great transcontinental routes or railroads located on the forty-seventh, fortieth, thirty-fifth, and thirty-second parallels of north latitude, giving details as to each main and branch line, with a general recapitulation showing the whole result.

Very respectfully,

THEO'S FRENCH, Auditor.

Hon. ROBERT M. MCLANE,
Chairman of Committee on Pacific Railroads,
House of Representatives.

---

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF AUDITOR OF RAILROAD ACCOUNTS,
Washington, D. C., January 26, 1881.

Report on the quantity and value of public lands granted by Congress to aid in the construction of the Pacific railroads.

The proposed resolution in regard to the matters embraced in this report is as follows:

"Resolved, &c., That the Committee on the Pacific Railroads, by sub-committee, be authorized to sit during the recess for the purpose of ascertaining the quantity and value of the public lands heretofore granted by Congress to aid in the construction of the Pacific railroads which have not vested in said roads by the terms of the several laws granting such lands, and the quantity and value of the said lands which have vested in said roads, how the same have been disposed of, at what price, and also how the proceeds of the same have been disposed of; also, the cost (in detail) of the construction of completed road, and the estimated cost (in detail) of the construction of road necessary to be built in order to complete the said railroads in accordance with the requirements of law; also, to ascertain the cost, or estimated cost, of construction of any and all railroads built, or proposed to be built, parallel or adjacent to the said railroads, whether or not the same are located on the line or lands reserved by any of the said granting acts of Congress; with authority to employ a clerk during that time, to obtain the assistance of the Auditor of Railroad Accounts, and to send for persons and papers or examine the same at the principal offices of said railroads; and all expenses necessarily incurred in the execution of this resolution shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House."

For the purpose of this report the Pacific railroads have been classified as follows, namely:

1. Northern, or route on forty-seventh parallel of latitude.
2. Union Central, or route on fortieth parallel of latitude.
3. New Mexico Southern, or route on thirty-fifth parallel of latitude.
4. Texas Southern, or route on thirty-second parallel of latitude.

The first or northern line is known as Northern Pacific, and extends from the Montreal River, in Wisconsin, to Puget Sound, Washington Territory. Branch roads are intended to be built to Portland, Oregon, and to other points, as may be deemed advisable. The main line and the branch to Portland only have land grants.

The second or Union Central line embraces the roads heretofore known as Union Pacific, Central Pacific, Kansas Pacific, Central Branch Union Pacific, and Sioux City and Pacific, all of which are subsidized with bonds as well as lands. It also embraces in its system the Denver Pacific and the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad in Nebraska, which are subsidized with land only.

The third or New Mexico Southern line extends from Missouri and Arkansas through the Indian Territory to California and the Pacific Ocean, and has a subsidy of lands only.

The fourth or Texas Southern line extends from Louisiana through Texas to connect with the Southern Pacific at Yuma, on the Colorado River, thus obtaining a through line to San Francisco, California. This line has a subsidy of lands only.

NORTHERN, OR ROUTE ON FORTY-SEVENTH PARALLEL.

The Northern Pacific Railroad Company.—This company was chartered by an act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, on the Pacific coast, by the northern route," (13 Stat., 365.)—Report of Auditor of Railroad Accounts, 1880, page 152.

Section 1 designates the route as follows, namely: "Beginning at a point on Lake Superior, in the State of Minnesota or Wisconsin; thence westerly by the most eligible railroad route, as shall be determined by said company, within the territory of the United States, on a line north of the forty-fifth degree of latitude to some point on Puget Sound, with a branch, via the valley of the Columbia River, to a point at or near Portland, in the State of Oregon, leaving the main trunk-line at the most suitable place, not more than three hundred miles from its western terminus."

Section 2 grants to the company the right of way through the public lands to the extent of "two hundred feet in width on each side of said railroad, including all necessary ground for station buildings, workshops, depots, machine-shops, switches, side tracks, turn-tables, and water-stations."

Section 3 grants to the company "every alternate section of public land, not mineral, designated by odd numbers, to the amount of twenty alternate sections per mile, on each side of said railroad line, as said company may adopt, through the Territories of the United States, and ten alternate sections of land per mile on each side of said railroad whenever it passes through any State, and whenever on the line thereof the United States have full title, not reserved, sold, granted, or otherwise appropriated, and free from pre-emption or other claims or rights, at the time the line of said railroad is definitely fixed, and a plat thereof filed in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office."

Section 6 enacts "that the President of the United States shall cause the lands to be surveyed for forty miles in width on both sides of the entire line of said road, after the general route shall be fixed, and as fast as may be required by the construction of said railroad; and the odd sections of land hereby granted shall not be liable to sale or entry or pre-emption before or after they are surveyed, except by said company, as provided in this act; but the provisions of the act of September, 1841, granting pre-emption rights, and the acts amendatory thereof, and of the act entitled 'An act to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain,' approved May 20, 1862, shall be, and the same are hereby, extended to all other lands on the line of said road when surveyed, excepting those hereby granted to said company. And the reserved alternate sections shall not be sold by the Government at a price less than $2.50 per acre when offered for sale."

Sections 8 and 9 give the conditions attached to the grant as follows, namely: "That each and every grant, right, and privilege herein are so made and given to, and accepted by, said Northern Pacific Railroad Company, upon and subject to the following conditions, namely: That the said company shall commence the work on said road within two years from the approval of this act by the President, and shall complete not less than fifty miles per year after the second year, and shall construct, equip, furnish, and complete the whole road by the 4th day of July, A. D. 1876;" and "that the United States make the several conditioned grants herein, and that the said Northern Pacific Railroad Company accept the same, upon the further condition that if the said company make any breach of the conditions hereof, and allow the same to continue for upwards of one year, then, in such case, at any time hereafter, the United States, by its Congress, may do any and all acts and things which may be needful and necessary to insure a speedy completion of the said road."

Section 10 enacts that "no mortgage or construction bonds shall ever be issued by said company on said road, or mortgage, or lien made in any way, except by the consent of the Congress of the United States."

Section 20 enacts "that the better to accomplish the object of this act, namely, to promote the public interest and welfare by the construction of said railroad and telegraph line, and keeping the same in working order, and to secure to the Government at all times, but particularly in time of war, the use and benefits of the same for postal, military, and other purposes, Congress may, at any time, having due regard for the rights of said Northern Pacific Railroad Company, add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act."

The joint resolution approved May 7, 1866, (14 Stats., 355,) extended the time for commencing and completing the railroad, for the term of two years. (See Report of Auditor of Railroad Accounts for 1880, page 159.)

The joint resolution approved July 1, 1868, (15 Stats., 255,) amended section 8 of the original act, so as to read as follows: "That each and every grant, right, and privilege herein, are so made and given to and accepted by said Northern Pacific Railroad Company upon and subject to the following conditions, namely: That the said company shall commence the work on said road within two years from and after the 2d day of July, 1868, and shall complete not less than one hundred miles per year after the second year thereafter, and shall construct, equip, furnish, and complete the whole road by the 4th day of July, A. D. 1877." (Auditor's Report for 1880, page 159.)

By the joint resolution approved March 1, 1869, (15 Stats., 346,) Congress gave its consent for the company "to issue its bonds, and to secure the same by mortgage upon its railroad and its telegraph line, for the purpose of raising funds with which to construct said railroad and telegraph line between Lake Superior and Puget Sound, and also upon its branch to a point at or near Portland, Oregon." (Auditor's Report for 1880, page 160.)

The joint resolution of April 10, 1869, (16 Stats., 57,) authorized the construction of a branch from a point near Portland to Puget Sound, (the line from Kalama to Tacoma, constructed and in operation.)

By resolution of May 31, 1870, (16 Stats., 378,) Congress authorized the company "to issue its bonds to aid in the construction and equipment of its road, and to secure the same by mortgage on its property and rights of property of all kinds and descriptions, real, personal, and mixed, including its franchise as a corporation;" also, to construct its main line via the valley of the Columbia River, with a branch across the Cascade Mountains to Puget Sound; and increased the indemnity limits to sixty miles on each side of the road.

Section 2 of this resolution provides "that Congress may at any time alter or amend this joint resolution, having due regard to the rights of said company and any other parties." (Auditor's Report for 1880, page 161.)

Under the authority of this resolution the company, on July 1, 1870, issued its thirty-year bonds bearing interest at the rate of 7.3 per cent. per annum, and secured the same by a mortgage, in accordance with the resolution, to an amount of about thirty million dollars. On the 16th of April, 1875, the company having previously defaulted on its interest, in proceedings of foreclosure the United States circuit court for the southern district of New York appointed a receiver. By a decree of that court the property and franchises were sold at auction August 12, 1875, and were purchased by a committee of bondholders, the sale being confirmed by the court August 25, 1875. The company was re-organized September 30, 1875, upon a plan by which the holders of the bonds of the company were reimbursed for the principal and interest up to and including July 1, 1878, in preferred stock at par, which it was proposed to issue to the amount of $51,000,000. This preferred stock is entitled to 8 per cent. dividends before any dividends are paid on the common stock, and is receivable at par for lands belonging to the company east of the Missouri River. Common stock was issued to the holders of the stock of the old company, share for share, and $49,000,000 of the common stock have been issued, the plan of re-organization being given in the annual report of the company for 1876, page 43.

In 1879 the company placed first mortgages upon the Missouri and Pend d'Oreille divisions of its road, and to June 30, 1880, had issued nearly four million dollars of the bonds secured thereby. On January 1, 1881, the company executed a general first mortgage on all its railroads, lands, property, and franchises to secure an issue of bonds to the amount of $25,000 per mile of the main and branch lines, payable in forty years, and bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum. This last mortgage provides for taking up, retiring, and canceling the bonds issued on the Missouri and Pend d' Oreille divisions; it is also provided in the mortgage that all moneys derived from the sales of lands are applicable to the payment of the interest and principal of the bonds; a sinking fund is also created, beginning July 1, 1886, by which 1 per cent. per annum is required to be paid to the trustee, in equal semi-annual installments.

From the reports of the General Land Office the rights of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company attached to their grant as follows, namely: By map of general route, through Minnesota and part of Washington Territory, August 13, 1870; through Dakota, Montana, Idaho, and a part of Washington Territory, February 21, 1872; of a branch line in Washington Territory, August 15, 1873; from Thomson to Moorhead, Minnesota, November 21, 1871; from Moorhead, Minnesota, to Bismarck, Dakota, May 26, 1873; from Kalama to Tenino, Washington Territory, September 13, 1873; from Tenino to Tacoma, Washington Territory, May 14, 1874.

The construction of the Northern Pacific Railroad was begun July 1, 1870, and between that date and March 1, 1874, a period of three years and nine months, five hundred and thirty miles of subsidized road had been completed and put in operation. To November 1, 1880, six hundred and eighty miles have been completed and put in operation, in addition to two hundred and twenty miles of other road in operation and about one hundred miles of new road not quite finished; in all, one thousand miles.

To June 30, 1880, there had been patented to the company 746,509 acres. The company has earned by construction about fifteen million acres of land to November 1, 1880, and sold to June 30, 1880, 2,600,000 acres for $9,000,000. The price of the company's agricultural lands is $2.50 per acre; coal and timber lands being reserved from sale until the country is occupied. The lands not yet earned by the company are about twenty-seven million acres, situated chiefly in Montana, Idaho, and Washington Territories.

The value of the company's lands vested and unvested may be reasonably estimated at $2.50 per acre, so that the lands unsold are worth, say, 39,900,000 acres at $2.50, $99,750,000. For a description of some of these lands reference is made to page 82 of the last annual report of the Auditor of Railroad Accounts.

In 1874 the company in its report to this Department gave the cost of the road and fixtures to June 30, 1874, as $21,353,416.11, and to that time had constructed five hundred and thirty miles of railroad, being an average cost of $40,289 per mile. The expenditure by items is as follows:

|---|---|
| Surveys | $1,108,278 52 |
| Construction, including docks and wharves | 14,446,356 54 |
| Auxiliary and connecting rail and water lines | 2,728,980 09 |
| Equipment | 2,434,346 25 |
| General and incidental expenses during construction | 635,454 71 |
| Total | 21,353,416 11 |

In addition to these five hundred and thirty miles, the company has constructed a branch line in Washington Territory from Tacoma to Wilkeson, thirty-two miles in length.

The road yet to be constructed and accepted may be stated as follows, with the estimated cost of the same, namely:

|---|---|
| Wisconsin division—Montreal River to Thompson Junction, 122 miles, at $20,000 per mile | $2,440,000 00 |
| Missouri division—Missouri River to Yellowstone River, 217 miles, at $12,000 per mile, including an iron bridge over the Missouri River at Bismarck, the cost of which is estimated at nearly $1,000,000, or about | 3,500,000 00 |
| Yellowstone, Rocky Mountain and Clark's Fork divisions—Yellowstone River to Lake Pend d'Oreille, 820 miles, at $30,000 per mile | 24,600,000 00 |
| Pend d'Oreille division—Lake Pend d'Oreille to Columbia River, 209 miles, at $21,500 per mile | 4,500,000 00 |
| Columbia River division—Junction of Columbia and Snake Rivers to Portland, 238 miles, at $31,500 per mile | 7,500,000 00 |
| Cascade Mountain division—Junction of Columbia and Snake Rivers to Puget Sound, 219 miles, at $30,000 per mile | 6,570,000 00 |
| Pacific division—Portland to Kalama, 40 miles, at $25,000 per mile | 1,000,000 00 |
| Total road to be constructed, 1,865 miles, at an estimated average cost of $26,868 per mile, amounting to | 50,110,000 00 |

The entire road when completed, 2,700 miles, will have cost about seventy-five million dollars, or at the rate of $28,000 per mile.

The conditions of all Government service on this road are found in section 11 of the charter act, among which one is, that the road is "subject to such regulations as Congress may impose restricting the charges for such Government transportation."

THE UNION-CENTRAL LINE OR ROUTE.

This line being composed of a main and branch lines having different owners, will be treated separately, and in the following order: 1. Union Pacific Railroad Company. 2. Kansas Pacific Railway Company, and 3, Denver Pacific Railway and Telegraph Company, composing the (4) Union Pacific Railway Company, consolidated. 5. Central Pacific Railroad Company. 6. Western Pacific Railroad Company, and (7) California and Oregon Railroad Company, composing the (8) Central Pacific Railroad Company. 9. Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company. 10. Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company. 11. Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company in Nebraska.

The Union Pacific Railroad Company.—This company, chartered by acts of Congress approved July 1, 1862, (12 Stat., 489;) and July 2, 1864, (13 Stat., 356;) received from the United States a grant of public lands to aid in the construction of its railroad and telegraph line, amounting to twenty sections or 12,800 acres per mile of road.

The length of road subsidized is 1,038.68 miles, extending from the Missouri River, near Omaha, Nebraska, to a point five miles west of the crossing of the Utah Central Railroad in Ogden, Utah. If none of the land had been previously disposed of by the United States the total grant would have been 13,295,104 acres.

The quantity which the company will obtain is estimated by the General Land Office to be about twelve million acres; but the estimate of the land commissioner of the company places it at 11,200,000 acres.

The location of the lands may be generally stated as follows, namely: 4,800,000 acres in Nebraska, 4,600,000 acres in Wyoming, 700,000 acres in Colorado, and 1,100,000 acres in Utah; of which it may be said that 3,500,000 acres are agricultural lands, 4,000,000 acres are grazing lands, and 3,700,000 acres desert or waste. About two million acres of the "agricultural" lands remained unsold December 31, 1879, worth, at an average price of $3.50 per acre, $7,000,000; about four million acres of the "grazing" lands, worth, at $1.25 per acre, $5,000,000; in all, worth $12,000,000—without estimating anything for the 3,700,000 acres of desert lands. To June 30, 1880, 1,859,475 acres of land had been patented to the company. To December 31, 1879, the company had sold nearly two million acres, as follows:

| 1869 | 128,825.28 | $4.535 | $586,808 29 |
| 1870 | 164,058.62 | 4.385 | 719,758 14 |
| 1871 | 206,605.97 | 3.855 | 795,557 53 |
| 1872 | 172,108.67 | 4.39 | 755,430 94 |
| 1873 | 177,083.50 | 5.55 | 983,030.3[illegible] |
| 1874 | 235,749.14 | 4.66 | 1,099,467 21 |
| 1875 | 111,965.55 | 3.66 | 409,916 10 |
| 1876 | 128,696.21 | 3.02 | 389,773 46 |
| 1877 | 69,015.87 | 4.98 | 343,768 02 |
| 1878 | 318,903.47 | 4.88 | 1,557,082 32 |
| 1879 | 243,337.31 | 4.141 | 1,007,855 63 |
| Total for eleven years | 1,956,349.59 | 4.42 | 8,648,447 97 |

From these sales forfeited and canceled contracts must be deducted, which leaves the net sales to the same date 1,568,438 acres, amounting to the sum of $6,916,811.58, being an average price of $4.41 per acre.

The lands are sold in small tracts, averaging about 100 acres to each purchaser, so that there have been 15,000 to 16,000 purchasers. Some sales are made for cash, but the large majority of the sales have been on time, deferred payments drawing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum.

The gross proceeds of sales, interest, forfeitures, &c., to December 31, 1879, have been $8,173,846.83, of which amount $4,412,033.88 has been received in cash, and the remainder, $3,761,812.95, in notes or land contracts yet to be paid. These gross proceeds are applied to the redemption of land-grant mortgage bonds, of which $10,400,000 have been issued and $4,101,000 redeemed.

The expenses of the land department, taxes on land, &c., amounting to $1,880,877.68 to December 31, 1879, have been paid by the company out of its ordinary income.

The cost of the railroad and its equipment to December 31, 1879, amounted to $118,682,223.96, or at the rate of $114,262.54 per mile. The details are as follows, namely:

The cost of building and equiping a railroad like the Union Pacific main line from Council Bluffs to Ogden, with similar grades and on the same route, the whole of it laid with steel rails, at the present time may be stated approximately at $32,000,000; say five hundred miles, Council Bluffs to Cheyenne, at $20,000 per mile, and five hundred and forty miles, Cheyenne to Ogden, at $40,000 per mile.

The Kansas Pacific Railway Company.—This company originally known as "the Leavenworth, Pawnee, and Western Railroad Company," and afterwards as "the Union Pacific Railway Company, eastern division," was chartered by the State of Kansas February 1, 1855, and received from the United States, under the Pacific Railroad acts before referred to, a grant of public lands to aid in the construction of its railroad and telegraph line. The grant was twenty sections, or 12,800 acres per mile of road.

The length of road subsidized is 638.6 miles, extending from the eastern boundary line of the State of Kansas, in Kansas City, to Denver, Colorado. The quantity of land granted would have amounted to 8,174,000 acres if none of the lands had been otherwise or previously disposed of by the Government. The General Land Office has estimated that the company will receive about six million acres, but the land commissioner of the company estimates about two hundred thousand acres more.

The location of this company's lands is as follows, namely: 2,600,000 acres in Colorado, 3,600,000 acres in Kansas. Of these probably one-third, say 2,000,000 acres, are "grazing" lands, and the remainder, say 4,000,000 acres, are "agricultural." The lands which were unsold December 31, 1879, lie chiefly in Western Kansas; about two million acres between Manhattan, Riley County, and Grinnell, Gove County worth on an average nearly three dollars per acre, and the remainder, 2,800,000 acres, between Grinnell and Denver, worth probably two dollars an acre; in all, worth about eleven million dollars.

To June 30, 1880, 828,830.44 acres had been patented to the company.

To December 31, 1879, the company had sold 1,521,111.53 acres, as follows, namely:

|---|---|---|---|
| 1868 | 111,271.29 | $2 96 | $329,812 67 |
| 1869 | 382,885.20 | 2 91 | 1,114,578 57 |
| 1870 | 124,168.59 | 3 19 | 396,196 06 |
| 1871 | 123,935.82 | 3 50 | 434,235 52 |
| 1872 | 68,851.29 | 2 92 | 199,841 71 |
| 1873 | 25,423.43 | 3 67 | 93,175 10 |
| 1874 | 35,393.96 | 3 29 | 117,708 61 |
| 1875 | 61,366.58 | 3 57 | 218,808 60 |
| 1876 | 74,554.09 | 4 23 | 315,420 62 |
| 1877 | 135,994.45 | 3 31 | 449,234 44 |
| 1878 | 207,938.03 | 3 38 | 795,997 83 |
| 1879 | 169,328.80 | 4 09 | 692,930 53 |
| Total | 1,521,111.53 | 3 39 | 5,157,940 26 |

Forfeited and canceled contracts for 229,657.16 acres, amounting to $737,979.77, being deducted, leaves the net sales 1,291,454.37 acres, and the amount for which sold $4,419,960.49, or an average of $3.42 per acre.

The lands have been sold principally on time, at one-fifth cash and balance in four annual installments, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum.

The gross proceeds of sales, interest, forfeitures, &c., to December 31, 1879, have been $4,404,232.52, of which $3,016,022.60 has been received in cash, and the remainder, $1,388,209.92, is held as land notes or contracts. By the terms of the land-grant mortgages, the gross proceeds of sales of land are to be applied to the redemption of the bonds issued thereon. The expenses, commissions, taxes, &c., paid to December 31, 1879, have amounted to $694,997.90.

To December 31, 1879, the cost of this railroad and its equipment, 670.5 miles, is reported by the company as $34,359,540.66, which is at the rate of $51,244.65 per mile.

A railroad like the Kansas Pacific, six hundred and seventy miles, most of it through a rolling prairie country, could be built with steel rails at this time for $15,000 per mile, and fully equipped for $5,000 per mile; in all, $20,000 per mile, or $13,500,000.

Denver Pacific Railway and Telegraph Company.—This company was incorporated November 19, 1867, under the general laws of the Territory of Colorado relating to corporations, and was organized December 14, 1867, with a board of trustees. The first annual meeting of stockholders was held on December 14, 1868, when permanent officers were elected.

By the act of Congress approved March 3, 1869, the Union Pacific Railway Company, eastern division, was authorized to transfer to the Denver Pacific Railway and Telegraph Company all the rights and privileges, subject to all the obligations, pertaining to that part of its line of railroad and telegraph between Denver City and Cheyenne. Under this law the company obtained its land grant of twenty sections or 12,800 acres per mile.

The length of road constructed is 105.89 miles, which entitles the company to 1,355,292 acres of land; but the General Land Office estimates the grant which the company will eventually receive as 1,100,000 acres, while the estimate of the company is only 971,771 acres, 800,000 acres of which are covered by a first mortgage given to secure an issue of $2,500,000 of bonds. The company's officers in 1870 estimated the value of the 800,000 acres included in the mortgage at $3,000,000.

All of the company's lands are in Colorado and are among the most fertile and valuable portion of the agricultural lands of that State, and some of the lands have valuable coal deposits.

By the terms of the contract for building the railroad, all of the company's lands granted by Congress over and above the 800,000 acres covered by the mortgage referred to were to revert to the contractors. These lands being left out of the question, the company had remaining December 31, 1879, 630,269 acres unsold, the average value of which may be estimated at $2.50 per acre, amounting to $1,598,170. To June 30, 1880, only 49,811.59 acres had been patented to the company. December 31, 1879, the company had sold lands as follows:

|---|---|---|---|
| 1870 | 32,613.00 | $4 17 | $136,076 43 |
| 1871 | 41,543.55 | 3 94 | 163,858 71 |
| 1872 | 19,959.00 | 4 07 | 81,195 91 |
| 1873 | 17,951.95 | 4 61 | 82,676 96 |

Deducting canceled sales, the net quantity sold during this period was 160,731.89 acres for $713,881.13, or at an average price of $4.44 per acre.

The cost of the road, 105.89 miles, as reported to this office is $6,495,350. But no details of the expenditures have been obtained; it was accepted by the president May 2, 1872. A parallel road like this could be built to-day for $15,000 per mile, say for $1,600,000.

The Union Pacific Railway Company.—This company is the successor, by consolidation, to the Union, Kansas, and Denver Pacific Companies.

Summarizing the statements heretofore given as to the three companies named, the following facts are shown, namely:

|---|---|
| Estimated quantity of land granted, (acres) | 22,824,396 |
| Estimated quantity of land vested under the grant, (acres) | 19,100,668 |

| Estimated present cost of similar road, 1,815 miles, at $30,000 per mile on an average | $54,450,000 00 |

The Central Pacific Railroad Company.—This company is the successor, by consolidation June 23, 1870, of the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California, organized June 28, 1861, and the Western Pacific Railroad Company, organized December 13, 1862, both deriving their charter powers from the State of California, although the State, by act of April 4, 1864, virtually dissolved the company as a State corporation. Subsequently, on August 22, 1870, the Central Pacific was consolidated with the California and Oregon, the San Francisco, Oakland and Alameda and the San Joaquin Valley Railroad Companies.

So far as relates to the subjects of this report, the three roads—Central Pacific, Western Pacific, and California and Oregon—will be treated separately.

The Central Pacific Railroad extends from Sacramento to a point five miles west of the crossing of the Utah Central Railroad in Ogden, Utah, 738.45 miles, of which but 737.50 miles have been subsidized with bonds and lands.

The land grant is under the same acts of Congress as that of the Union Pacific, and amounts to twenty sections, or 12,800 acres, per mile, equal to 9,440,000 acres for the entire road; from which, however, deducting lands previously granted, sold, or reserved by the United States, estimated by the General Land Office at 1,440,000 acres, leaves about eight million acres vested in the company.

Of these 8,000,000 acres 708,862 had been patented to the company to June 30, 1880, and the company had sold to December 31, 1879, 295,886.79 acres, for $1,114,999.66, being an average price of $3.77 per acre. The lands have been sold in small tracts, some for cash, but most of them on time, 20 per cent. of the principal being paid at time of purchase. This company, unlike some others, sells no lands before it has received patents therefor. The proceeds of sales of land are applied to the purchase of land-grant bonds.

The lands remaining unsold December 31, 1879, say 7,700,000 acres, lying most of them in the desert country between Salt Lake and the Sierra Nevada Mountains, are largely unavailable, and many years must elapse before anything can be realized from them. The real value of these lands is not over 50 cents per acre, or $3,850,000, although the company includes them in the general estimate of all their lands at $2.50 per acre, which is the minimum price placed upon adjoining lands belonging to the Government.

The cost of this portion of the Central Pacific Railroad has not been ascertained in detail. In a report published in 1870 the cost of the property on December 31, 1869, was itemized as follows:

|---|---|
| Construction accounts | $84,129,092 |
| Buildings | 2,159,718 |
| Engines | 1,846,500 |
| Cars | 1,988,125 |
| Total | 90,123,345 |
| Represented by capital stock | 40,097,290 |
| First-mortgage bonds | 25,517,000 |
| United States bonds | 25,517,000 |
| Other debt | 7,871,777 |
| Total liabilities | 99,003,067 |

A road similar to that of the Central Pacific, from Ogden to Sacramento, seven hundred and forty miles, could probably be built to-day for an average price of $30,000 per mile, or $22,200,000.

The Western Pacific Railroad Company.—This company was organized December 13, 1862, under the laws of the State of California, and was consolidated with the Central Pacific June 23, 1870.

Under the Pacific Railroad acts the company was authorized to construct a railroad from the American River east of Sacramento to San José, California, a distance of 123.16 miles, and received a subsidy in bonds and lands similar to that granted to the other Pacific railroad companies.

The quantity of lands included in the grant has been estimated by the General Land Office as 1,100,000 acres. To June 30, 1880, 424,727.58 acres had been patented to the company.

The Western Pacific Railroad Company had disposed of its lands prior to consolidation with the Central Pacific Railroad Company.

In a report published in 1870 the cost of this road was stated as $12,347,332, offset by an indebtedness of $2,808,290, and a share capital paid in, $7,900,000.

A portion of the road is of an expensive character, but it could probably be built to-day for $35,000 per mile, or $4,300,000 for the whole road.

California and Oregon Railroad Company.—This company was organized under the laws of California June 30, 1865, and was consolidated with the Central Pacific August 22, 1870.

By an act of Congress approved July 25, 1866, (14 Stat., 239,) the company received a grant of twenty sections (12,800 acres) per mile for a railroad from the Central Pacific Railroad to the northern line of the State. The estimated distance is two hundred and ninety-one miles, which would make the grant 3,724,800 acres.

A condition of the grant is that the whole road shall be completed on or before July 1, 1880. (15 Stat., 80.)

The road completed extends from Roseville to Redding, California, 151.81 miles; road uncompleted, 139.19 miles. The lands which have not vested by reason of non-completion of road amount to 1,781,632 acres, leaving 1,943,168 acres vested in the company, or so much thereof as was not previously disposed of by the United States.

To June 30, 1880, there had been patented of these lands 1,338,039.27 acres. To December 31, 1879, the company had sold 366,622 acres, for $2,970,365, or an average price of $8.65 per acre. The lands remaining unsold at that time were 1,576,546 acres, worth, at a reasonable estimate, say $4.50 per acre, over $7,000,000.

The one hundred and fifty-two miles of road were constructed between 1867 and 1872, the whole road being opened for business September 1, 1872. The cost in detail of this road has not been ascertained. In 1870, when some eighty miles of the road had been completed, a report was published in which the cost of the road was stated as $2,750,000, or about $35,000 per mile. The road could be built to-day for $25,000 per mile, or $3,800,000.

From the above statements in regard to these three roads, namely, the Central Pacific, the Western Pacific, and the California and Oregon, the following condensed statement is made:

Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company.—The Legislature of the Territory of Kansas, by an act approved February 11, 1859, granted a charter to the Atchison and Pike's Peak Railroad Company.

On November 20, 1866, by vote of persons owning a majority of the stock and in compliance with the laws of the State of Kansas, the name was changed to "Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company," to take effect on and after January 1, 1867.

By the thirteenth section of the act of Congress approved July 1, 1862, which chartered the Union Pacific Railroad Company, the Hannibal and Saint Joseph Railroad Company was authorized to build a railroad from Saint Joseph, via Atchison, to connect with the road through Kansas. By regular proceedings beginning June 9, 1863, and ratified by votes of the stockholders, the Hannibal and Saint Joseph Railroad Company assigned to the Atchison and Pike's Peak Railroad Company all their right, title, and interest in the grant to them by the Pacific Railroad act of July 1, 1862, which assignment was formally accepted by the Atchison and Pike's Peak Railroad Company on May 26, 1865.

The land grant to this company is twenty sections, or 12,800 acres per mile for one hundred miles, extending from the Missouri River at Atchison westwardly through Kansas.

The majority of the public lands through which this road runs having been disposed of prior to the grant, the company will obtain only some 250,000 acres, 187,608 of which had been patented to them to June 30, 1880.

To June 30, 1880, about one hundred and seventy thousand acres had been sold by the company at an average price of, say, $5 per acre, amounting to $850,000; and 80,000 acres remained unsold worth about the same price per acre, $5, amounting to $400,000.

The proceeds of the sales of land have been applied to the payment of interest on the first-mortgage bonds and to the general purposes of the company from time to time.

Construction was commenced on this road from Atchison to Waterville, one hundred miles, in July, 1865, and the first section of twenty miles was accepted by the President of the United States on July 12, 1866, and the whole road was completed by January 20, 1868.

The cost of the road, construction, and equipment, as reported to this office December 31, 1879, is $3,913,408.64, or at the rate of $39,134.04 per mile. A road similar to this could be built and equipped to-day for from $15,000 to $18,000 per mile, or, say, $1,650,000.

The Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company.—This company was organized August 4, 1864, under the laws of the State of Iowa.

By section 13 of the act of Congress approved July 1, 1862, which chartered the Union Pacific Railroad Company, it was enacted that "whenever there shall be a line of railroad completed through Minnesota or Iowa to Sioux City, then the said Pacific Railroad Company is hereby authorized and required to construct a railroad and telegraph from said Sioux City, upon the most direct and practicable route, to a point on, and so as to connect with, the branch railroad and telegraph in this section hereinbefore mentioned."

Section 17, of the act of July 2, 1864, so amends section 13 above quoted as to release the Union Pacific Railroad Company from the construction of said branch, and entitles the company so constructing it to receive in bonds an amount not larger than the said Union Pacific Company would be entitled to receive if it had constructed the branch road, and to receive alternate sections of land for ten miles in width on each side of the same along the whole length of said branch.

The President of the United States, on December 24, 1864, designated "the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company" as the company approved by him to construct the branch line named in section 17 of the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864.

This company, after careful examination and surveys to ascertain "the most direct and practicable route," filed its map of definite location in Nebraska November 9, 1866, and in Iowa between November 20 and December 7, 1866, from which dates its rights attached to the lands granted.

The original idea of the Pacific Railroad act was that a branch from Sioux City, Iowa, to some point on the Union Pacific Railroad, not further west than the one hundredth meridian, should be constructed. This being impracticable, owing to the character of the country—the streams and valleys all running from northwest to southeast—which would require immense fills and cuts, the act of July 2, 1864, modified the route so as to permit any company constructing the road to select the point of junction.

The quantity of lands patented under the provisions of the foregoing acts has been reported by the General Land Office as 41,318.23 acres.

All lands, lots, and land assets of this road were sold April 15, 1875, to the Missouri Valley Land Company for $200,000.

The construction of this road was begun in the fall of 1866, the first section of the railroad and telegraph was accepted March 27, 1868, and the last one was accepted March 2, 1869. The road was opened for traffic February 11, 1869. The length of subsidized road is 101.77 miles.

This road is subject to all the conditions and requirements applicable to it as a branch of the Pacific Railroad. The Supreme Court of the United States, in revising and affirming the judgment of the circuit court of the United States for the district of Iowa, (99 Supreme Court Reports, 491,) having decided that this road is a branch of the Pacific Railroad and subject to the same conditions as regards the payment of "5 per cent. of its net earnings" toward the reimbursement of the United States on account of bonds and interest.

The company, in its report to this Department for the year ending June 30, 1880, gives the cost of the road and fixtures to that date as $5,355,551.28, having constructed 107.42 miles of railroad, being an average cost of $49,856 per mile.

A road has been constructed west of the Missouri River from Sioux City to Omaha during the past year, but it is much longer and more expensive to operate. A road like the Sioux City and Pacific could probably be built to-day for $15,000 per mile, $1,621,300.

The Burlington and Missouri Railroad Company, in Nebraska.—By section 18 of the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company, organized under the laws of the State of Iowa, was "authorized to extend its road through the Territory of Nebraska from the point where it strikes the Missouri River, south of the mouth of the Platte River, to some point not further west than the one hundredth meridian of west longitude, so as to connect, by the most practicable route, with the main trunk of the Union Pacific Railroad, or that part of it which runs from Omaha to the said one hundredth meridian of west longitude." The right of way is also granted by this section "to the extent of two hundred feet where it may pass over the public lands, including all necessary grounds for stations, buildings, work-shops, depots, machine-shops, switches, side-tracks, turn-tables, and water-tanks."

Section 19, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of said road, grants to the said Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company every alternate odd-numbered section of public land, excepting mineral lands, to the amount of ten alternate sections, or 6,400 acres per mile on each side of the road. Section 20 provides that when twenty consecutive miles of road shall have been completed the "President of the United States shall appoint three commissioners to examine and report to him in relation thereto; and if it shall appear to him that twenty miles of said road have been completed as required by this act, then, upon certificate of said commissioners to that effect, patents shall issue conveying the right and title to said lands to said company on each side of said road, as far as the same is completed, to the amount aforesaid; and such examination, report, and conveyance by patent shall continue from time to time, in like manner, until said road shall have been completed." It also provides "that no Government bonds shall be issued to the said Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company to aid in the construction of said extension of its road: And provided further, That said extension shall be completed within the period of ten years from the passage of this act."

The line constructed and owned by this company extends from Plattsmouth to Fort Kearney, Nebraska, a distance of 190.5 miles. The first section of eighty miles was accepted by the President of the United States October 9, 1871, and the last section November 4, 1872. The road was opened for through traffic September 2, 1872.

The estimated quantity of lands granted by this act is 2,441,600 acres. The quantity patented to June 30, 1880, amounted to 2,374,090.77 acres. The following statement of the business of the land department of this company is taken from Poor's Manual for 1880:

General account, land department, December 31, 1879.

The cost of construction and equipment of this road is not given separately, the total cost being stated at $8,294,955, or an average of $43,306 per mile.

A road like the Burlington and Missouri River in Nebraska could probably be built to-day for $16,000 per mile—$3,048,000.

Summarizing the statements heretofore given, the following condensed facts are shown, embracing all the roads of the "Union Central line of route," as enumerated on page 11, of this report.

THE NEW MEXICO SOUTHERN, OR ROUTE ON THIRTY-FIFTH PARALLEL.

The Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company.—This company was chartered by an act of Congress approved July 27, 1866, entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast." (14 Stats., 292; Auditor's Report for 1880, page 163.)

By this act the corporation was authorized and empowered to construct and enjoy "a continuous railroad and telegraph line" from Springfield, Missouri, to the Pacific Ocean, across the Indian Territory, Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, and California, as a main line, and from Van Buren, Arkansas, to the point where the main line strikes the Canadian River in the Indian Territory, as a branch line, more particularly described in section 1 of the act.

The grants made to the company by the act consist of the right of way through the public lands to the extent of one hundred feet on each side of the railroad, the right to use materials from adjacent lands belonging to the United States, the right to take all grounds or lands, in addition to the one hundred feet on each side of the road that may be necessary for station, shop, turn-table, switching, or other purposes, exemption of the right of way from taxation in the Territories, and for every mile of said railroad constructed in the Territories forty sections, 25,600 acres, of the public lands, and for every mile in the States twenty sections, 12,800 acres, of the same. (See sections 2 and 3 of the act.)

The conditions attached to these grants are given in section 8 of the act, as follows, namely: Work on the road was to be commenced within two years from the date of approval of the act, July 27, 1866, that is, before July 27, 1868; after the second year not less than fifty miles of road per year was to be completed, and the main line was to be completed by July 4, 1878; and if the company suffered any breach of these conditions to continue over one year, section 9 of the act provides that the United States may at any time thereafter "do any and all acts and things which may be needful and necessary to insure a speedy completion of the said road."

Maps of the general route having been filed, public lands embraced within the limits of the grant were withdrawn from sale and the right of the company attached thereto, as follows, namely:

| On line from— | To— | Date. |
|---|---|---|
| Springfield, Missouri | West line of Missouri | Dec. 17, 1866 |

The construction of this railroad was commenced July 4, 1868; and the sections of road below named have been examined by commissioners and reported on by them to the President of the United States, who has from time to time authorized patents for lands so earned to be issued to the company:

The Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company having suffered a default in the payment of interest on their outstanding bonds, the mortgage given to secure the same was foreclosed by a decree of the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Missouri, and the entire property, including the land grant in Missouri, was sold, by virtue of said decree, on September 7, 1876, to William F. Buckley, and by him conveyed November 2, 1876, to the Saint Louis and San Francisco Railway Company, which company became and is now the owner of the property and franchises in Missouri which had belonged to the South Pacific and Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Companies, and also of about 655,000 acres of South Pacific lands and 306,000 acres of Atlantic and Pacific lands.

West of the western boundary of the State of Missouri the road and appurtenances in the Indian Territory and in New Mexico are still owned by the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company. The road from Albuquerque, New Mexico, west is known as the "western division."

For the purpose of obtaining means to build and equip the "western division" the company has resolved to issue and negotiate bonds to an amount not exceeding $25,000 per mile, secured by a first mortgage on the franchises, railroad lands, land grants, and other property pertaining to said "western division." The act of Congress approved April 20, 1871, (17 Stat., 19,) authorized the company to "mortgage its road, equipment, lands, franchises, privileges, and other rights and property, subject to such terms, conditions, and limitations as its directors may prescribe." (Auditor's Report for 1880, page 170.)

The company is now examining the route from Vinita, Indian Territory, westward to Albuquerque, New Mexico, with a view to the construction of this part of the road at an early day. The length of this division will be about seven hundred and fifty miles, for four hundred miles of which the land grant is contingent upon the extinguishment of Indian titles thereto or such other arrangement, to be approved by the President, as any Indian tribe or nation may determine upon.

The length of road and extent of land grant for the whole line included in the charter act may be stated approximately as follows, namely:

| State or Territory. | From— | To— | Miles. | Acres per mile. | Acres of land granted. |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Missouri | Springfield | West line | 90 | 12,800 | 1,152,000 |
| Indian | East line | West line | 400 | 25,600 | 10,240,000 |
| Indian | East line | Canadian River | 300 | 25,600 | 7,680,000 |
| Texas | East line | West line | 200 | 12,800 | 2,560,000 |
| New Mexico | East line | West line | 450 | 25,600 | 11,520,000 |
| Arizona | East line | West line | 400 | 25,600 | 10,240,000 |
| California | East line | San Francisco | 655 | 12,800 | 8,384,000 |
| Arkansas | West line | Van Buren | 5 | 12,800 | 64,000 |

The company's estimate of the above is 2,472.98 miles of road and 49,244,803 acres of land. The estimate of the General Land Office is 2,544.65 miles of road and 50,067,600 acres of land.

The United States having no public lands in the State of Texas, and the lands in the Indian Territory having been "otherwise appropriated" at the date of the grant, there must be deducted from the above total 20,480,000 acres, which leaves 31,360,000 acres actually granted, from which is likewise to be deducted the following, namely:

| | Acres. |
|---|---|
| 1. Lands in Missouri previously disposed of | 645,184 |
| 2. Lands in New Mexico, "mineral," and otherwise disposed of, estimated at one-half of the grant | 5,760,000 |
| 3. Lands in Arizona, "mineral," and otherwise disposed of, estimated at one-half of the grant | 5,120,000 |
| 4. Lands in California of the same character, estimated at one-third of the grant | 2,794,666 |
| 5. Lands in Arkansas otherwise disposed of | 32,000 |
| Total deductions, additional | 14,351,850 |

After all these deductions are made, the quantity of land remaining for the use of the railroad company would be but 17,008,150 acres, and of this quantity the Saint Louis and San Francisco Railway Company received, in 1876, about 300,000 acres, and there had been disposed of by the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, prior to 1876, about 200,000 acres, the proceeds of which were applied to the construction of the road in Missouri; so that in round numbers about 16,500,000 acres of land are only available for the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, to aid in the construction of its railroad of more than 2,000 miles, from Seneca, Missouri, through the Indian Territory, Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, and California, to the Pacific Ocean or San Francisco.

These lands are worth, probably, on an average, not more than $2 per acre when brought into market by reason of the railroad being built, or $33,000,000; but that is merely a nominal value, sales being slow and difficult until settlers are assured of protection from Indians and outlaws in that section of the country. From a recent report of the superintendent of the western division of the railroad, the following facts in regard to the country on the line of the road between Albuquerque and the Colorado River, a distance of six hundred and twenty miles, have been gathered:

Between Albuquerque and the San Francisco Mountains the country is chiefly occupied by large herders and stock raisers, some of the land being cultivated. Many of these herders are Indians. There is considerable timbered land within easy reach of the road and some saw-mills are now being erected. In the immediate neighborhood of the mountains the country is described as capable of being made the first summer and winter resort in the country. Between the San Francisco Mountains and the Great Colorado River, some three hundred miles, the country is known to be rich in minerals, as well as affording fine grazing and agricultural prospects.

As to the location of the line, it is described as being "marvelous in its alignment, its grades and general characteristics. To cross the continental divide, the Rocky Mountains of the United States, with only a maximum grade of fifty feet per mile, and this only going west, the east-bound approach being only thirty feet per mile, in a valley a mile wide, with no tunnels, are certainly advantages enjoyed by no other line." This is the language of Superintendent Smith, who is on the ground.

The superintendent's estimate of the annual business that may be done on this six hundred and twenty miles is about fifty thousand tons. If this tonnage is carried to Albuquerque it would make on an average about twelve million tons carried one mile per annum, which, at an average rate of five cents per ton per mile, would give a gross earning from freight carried amounting to $600,000.

Of the 306,111 acres of land acquired by the Saint Louis and San Francisco Railway Company in 1876, to December 31, 1879, 15,000 acres had been sold at an average price of $3.25 per acre, amounting to $48,750. Prior to November 6, 1876, the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company had disposed of 200,000 acres of the Missouri lands at an average price of $2.87½ per acre, amounting to $575,000.

No detail of construction has yet been obtained such as to enable a statement to be made showing the cost of the subsidized line; on December 31, 1879, the company reported the cost of "franchises and property" as $28,841,974.50, being two hundred and ninety-two and one-half miles of railroad, &c., in Missouri, extending from Pacific to the western State line near Seneca, making an average cost of nearly one hundred thousand dollars per mile. The road runs through a country where many heavy grades and sharp curves are required, and is of quite an expensive character to build. The property is now in good condition, better than the average of western roads.

Under the authority of the act of Congress approved April 20, 1871, the company on July 1, 1880, issued its thirty-year bonds to the amount of $25,000 per mile, bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually in January and July, and secured the same by a mortgage on the franchises, right of way, railroad, telegraph, lands, land grants, and other property pertaining to the western division of the road, extending from Albuquerque, New Mexico, to the Pacific Ocean.

The payment of the coupons is also guaranteed by the Saint Louis and San Francisco Railway Company and the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad Company, not exceeding 25 per cent. of the gross amount of their earnings respectively during the six months preceding the due date of such coupons. The mortgage provides that the net proceeds of the land grant shall be used solely for the payment of interest on the first and second mortgage bonds, for the principal and interest of any advances made by the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé and the Saint Louis and San Francisco Railroad Companies, and for the purchase and cancellation of the first-mortgage bonds.

The Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad Company and the Saint Louis and San Francisco Railway Company each own one-half of the capital stock of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company.

Fifty miles of the western division of this road have just been reported ready for examination by commissioners—making one hundred miles in all completed west of Albuquerque to date.

The Southern Pacific Railroad Company.—The Southern Pacific Railroad Company was incorporated under the laws of the State of California December 2, 1865.

On October 12, 1870, articles of consolidation were entered into with the following-named roads: San Francisco and San José, chartered August 18, 1860; Santa Clara and Pajaro Valley, chartered January 2, 1868; and California Southern, chartered January 22, 1870. The Southern Pacific Branch Railroad Company, chartered December 23, 1872, was consolidated with this road August 19, 1873, and the Los Angeles and San Pedro Railroad Company, chartered February 18, 1868, on December 14, 1874. By virtue of the consolidation, the new company succeeds to all the rights, privileges, and franchises of the companies named above.

Section 18 of the act of Congress approved July 27, 1866, which chartered the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, authorized this company to connect with the road of that company at such point on the boundary-line of the State of California as they shall deem most suitable for a railroad line to San Francisco, and to aid in its construction, similar grants of land were made to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, subject to all the conditions and limitations prescribed for said Atlantic and Pacific Railroad.

The sections of the main line were accepted by the President of the United States, as follows:

| Number of section. | Miles. | Date. |
|---|---|---|
| First section, San José to Gilroy | 30.26 | January 19, 1871. |
| Second section, Gilroy to Tres Pinos | 20.00 | October 23, 1871. |
| Third section, from Goshen, south | 20.00 | October 1, 1872. |
| Fourth section, commencing at twentieth mile | 20.00 | August 6, 1873. |
| Fifth section, commencing at fortieth mile | 20.00 | October 23, 1874. |
| Sixth section, commencing at sixtieth mile | 20.00 | August 23, 1875. |
| Seventh section, commencing at eightieth mile, near Bealeville | 20.00 | June 16, 1876. |
| Eighth section, from Goshen, (west) near Lamoore | 20.00 | January 25, 1877. |
| Ninth section, from Lamoore to Huron | 20.00 | February 21, 1877. |
| Tenth section, from near Bealeville to Mojave | 41.66 | February 13, 1878. |
| Total | 231.92 | |

* From Mojave to the eastern boundary of the State and from Tres Pinos to Huron, the former about two hundred miles in length and the latter varying according to route from one hundred to one hundred and sixty miles, remain unbuilt, and the lands granted remain unvested in the company. The total land grant under the act of 1866 was, say, for five hundred and eighty-eight miles, at 12,800 acres per mile, 7,526,400 acres. Of this grant 2,768,576 acres have vested in the company by virtue of the construction of the 231.92 miles of road referred to, and 4,757,824 remain unearned by construction and unvested. No part of the line aided by a land grant is now under construction; nor is it believed that the company has any intention to construct their road from Mojave eastward. For a statement of the sales of land, cost of construction, and other matters connected with the Southern Pacific reference is made to that part of the report embracing the Texas Southern route immediately succeeding this.

THE TEXAS SOUTHERN, OR ROUTE ON THIRTY-SECOND PARALLEL OF LATITUDE.

The Texas and Pacific Railway Company.—This company was chartered by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1871, entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes." (16 Stats., 573; see Auditor's Report for 1880, page 170.)

Section 1 designates the route, which may be stated as follows, namely: From a point at or near Marshall, Texas; thence to a point at or near El Paso; thence through New Mexico and Arizona to a point on the Rio Colorado, at or near the southwestern boundary of California; thence to San Diego, pursuing in the location thereof as near as may be the thirty-second parallel of north latitude.

The company was vested with all the powers, privileges, and immunities necessary to carry into effect the purposes of the act.

Section 8 grants a right of way through the public lands to the extent of two hundred feet in width on each side of the railroad, and grounds for stations, buildings, workshops, &c., not exceeding forty acres of land at any one point.

To aid in the construction of said road, section 9 grants every alternate odd-numbered section of public lands, not mineral, to the amount of forty sections or 25,600 acres per mile in the Territories, and twenty sections or 12,800 acres per mile in California.

Section 17 provides that the company shall commence construction simultaneously at San Diego, California, and at Marshall, Texas, and that at least fifty consecutive miles from each of said points shall be completed and in running order within two years after the passage of the act, and to so continue to construct each year thereafter a sufficient number of miles to secure the completion of the whole line * * * within ten years, that is, by March 3, 1881. The act of May 2, 1872, extended the time to May 2, 1882.

Section 18 of the original act provides for the appointment of a commissioner by the President of the United States to examine the various sections of twenty miles of road as completed; * * * and upon the acceptance by the President of the United States of said sections patents shall be issued to said company for the lands so earned.

By the act of Congress approved May 2, 1872, the name, style, and title was changed to "the Texas and Pacific Railway Company," and section 17 of the act of March 3, 1871, amended so as to require that at least one hundred consecutive miles of railroad should be completed and in running order within two years after the passage of the act, that is, by May 1, 1874; (three hundred miles of road were in operation before that time.) It also provides that the company shall commence construction from San Diego eastward within one year, that is, by May 1, 1873, and construct not less than ten miles before the expiration of the second year, and thereafter not less than twenty-five miles per annum in continuous line between San Diego and the Colorado River until the junction is formed with the line from the east. Little or none of the line from San Diego eastward has been constructed. From the Colorado River at Yuma, Arizona, a line of railroad has been constructed by another company, known as the Southern Pacific Railroad Company of Arizona, under the supposition that the general law of 1875 gave them a right of way over the public lands of the United States, although section 5 of that act excepted any lands specially reserved from sale.

In March, 1872, the Texas and Pacific Railway Company acquired by purchase and consolidation all of the franchises and property of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation organized under the laws of Texas, and operating sixty-six miles of road between Shreveport and Longview, with a right to extend its line to El Paso. It subsequently acquired, in like manner, the charter privileges and property of the Southern Transcontinental Railway Company, organized under the laws of Texas, with right to construct a road from the northeast boundary of the State to El Paso, and the property and franchises of the Memphis, El Paso and Pacific Railroad Company, another Texas corporation.

On May 31, 1880, the number of miles of road operated was as follows, namely:

|---|---|
| From Shreveport, Louisiana, to Fort Worth, Texas | 219.69 |
| From Texarkana to Sherman | 155.12 |
| From Marshall to Texarkana Junction | 69.05 |
| Total | 443.86 |

The first section, extending from Marshall to Dallas, a distance of one hundred and forty-seven miles, was accepted by the President of the United States April 7, 1874; the second section, extending from Marshall to boundary-line between Louisiana and Texas, (22.12 miles,) from Marshall to Texarkana, (74.23 miles,) and from Shreveport to Brookston, (56.18 miles,) was accepted August 9, 1875. The last section, extending from Texarkana Junction to Brookston, and from Dallas to Fort Worth, a distance of one hundred and twenty-seven miles, was accepted March 8, 1877.

The company has already entered into a contract for the completion of the road from Fort Worth to El Paso, a distance of six hundred miles. The work was commenced March 5, 1880, and the whole line is to be completed by January 1, 1883.

The quantity of land granted to the Texas and Pacific Railway Company is estimated at 18,000,000 acres, lying in Mexico, Arizona, and California. No lands have been earned by construction of railroad in California or the Territories, and consequently none have yet vested in the company; but the right of way and the land grant are subject, under the provisions of section 17 of the charter act and section 5 of the supplemental act of May 2, 1872, to such action as Congress may deem necessary to secure a speedy completion of the road.

The cost of construction and equipment on May 31, 1880, is reported at $27,418,107.94, which includes expenditures for surveys and location of entire line of 1,457 miles west of Fort Worth. The average cost per mile is $61,771.

The Southern Pacific Railroad Company.—The act of Congress approved March 3, 1871, which incorporated the Texas Pacific, provides, in section 23, that for the purpose of connecting the Texas Pacific Railroad with the city of San Francisco the Southern Pacific Railroad Company of California is authorized to construct a line of railroad from a point at or near Tehachapa Pass, by way of Los Angeles, to the Texas Pacific Railroad at or near the Colorado River, with the same rights, grants, and privileges, and subject to the same limitations, restrictions, and conditions as were granted by the act of July 27, 1866, before referred to.

The grant of land under this act, being 12,800 acres per mile of road from the Colorado River at or near Fort Yuma to Mojave—346.96 miles—amounts to 4,441,088 acres, supposing none of the land to have been otherwise disposed of. The road having been constructed, was accepted by the President of the United States as follows, namely:

| Sections. | Miles. | Date. |
|---|---|---|
| Section 1 | 50 | May 9, 1874 |
| Section 2 | 50 | Nov. 11, 1875 |
| Section 3 | 50 | Jan. 21, 1876 |
| Section 4 | 78.59 | Mar. 2, 1877 |
| Section 5 | 118.37 | Jan. 23, 1878 |
| Total | 346.96 | |

On December 31, 1879, the total length of road completed and in operation was as follows:

| Northern division: | Miles. |
|---|---|
| From San Francisco to Tres Pinos | 100.49 |
| From Carnadero to Soledad | 60.40 |
| Total | 160.89 |

| Southern division: | Miles. |
|---|---|
| From Huron, via Goshen and Los Angeles, to west bank of Colorado River | 528.56 |
| From Los Angeles to Wilmington | 22.06 |
| Total | 550.62 |

Total miles of railroad owned, 711.51; of which 578.88 have been subsidized with a land grant from the United States.

The Southern Division is leased to and operated by the Central Pacific Railroad Company; lease terminable in five years from January 1, 1880, or when eastern connections are made.

The quantity of land covered by the grants to this company is estimated by the General Land Office at 9,520,000 acres.

The quantity patented to the company to June 30, 1880, was 1,048,000.65 acres; of which the sales to the same date have been 279,623.40 acres, at an average price of $3.64 per acre, amounting to $1,017,255.89. Sales are made for cash, or part cash and the balance in five years' time, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum, payable in advance. Of the above sales 120,000 acres have been sold for cash at about $2 per acre, and the remainder, 160,000 acres, on credit, at nearly $5 per acre.

The proceeds of land sales are applied exclusively to the redemption of the company's bonds.

The quantity of land vested and unsold June 30, 1880, may be estimated at 5,407,553 acres, worth at a fair average value $1.25 per acre. The company's estimate of the value of the grants from the United States, as stated in their last annual report to their stockholders, is upwards of $40,000,000.

The company's estimates, on account of both grants, are as follows:

| | Acres. |
|---|---|
| Main line San Jose to Needles | 7,523,072.00 |
| Branch line, Mojave to Yuma | 4,441,088.00 |
| Estimated total number of acres granted | 11,964,160.00 |
| Less total number of acres sold to June 30, 1880 | 279,623.40 |
| Estimated numbers of acres unsold to June 30, 1880 | 11,684,536.60 |
| Estimated quantity earned by construction of road | 7,413,760.00 |
| Estimated quantity capable of being earned | 4,550,400.00 |

The land agent of the company says: "It is difficult to estimate the quantity of land that will eventually inure to the company from these land grants, as there are included within the limits large areas of Spanish grants and lands otherwise excepted. It is not at all probable that there will be sufficient available lands belonging to the United States within the indemnity limits to make good these deficiencies." He also says: "At the time this grant was made, the value of the lands was rated as trifling, as the best land in Southern California had long been held and occupied by Spanish-speaking residents and their descendants, and were devoted almost wholly to grazing purposes, several acres in the average being required per head of stock. So broken, dry, and forbidding in aspect was the remainder still under the disposition of the Government, that no one, at that day, imagined it could be of the slightest assistance toward the building of the road, and the greater part of it so remains to this day. It resembles, and is commonly known as 'desert land,' totally incapable of being made useful for the support of vegetation or animal life. However, where there is running water sufficiently near, portions of it may be used for pasturage. * * * The Southern Pacific Railroad Company would be glad to co-operate with the Government in any plan whereby its alternate sections could be leased or sold in large unbroken tracts for grazing; and there are millions of acres which it would be willing to sell for such purposes outright, at twenty cents an acre." On the other hand, the company, in its printed annual report to the stockholders, speaks in the highest terms of its lands. The following extracts are taken from the report of the land commissioner: "I cannot forbear, in this connection, alluding once more to the immense increase in agricultural productions, and to the surprising effect of irrigation upon land in Southern California. * * * Lands previously of no value but as cattle ranges, are now becoming the homesteads of thrifty, industrious families. * * * By the use of water, the valuable lucern known as alfalfa has been introduced, and makes it possible to sustain a greater number of cattle. * * * This wonderful clover can be cut three or four times in a season, realizing to the acre ten or twelve tons of hay per annum. * * * But all that part of the State in which this company's lands are situated is especially adapted by climate, soil and situation, to the raising of semi-tropical fruits. * * * Even where water, through canals, cannot be procured, the lands sell, the purchaser being able, by boring a well and the assistance of a 'windmill,' to cultivate acres enough to support a family. Waste or 'desert lands' are thus made available or useful."

In regard to the "mussel slough" lands, about which there has been some trouble between the company and the settlers, the land agent says: "Had it not been for the discovery that portions of the land in the San Joaquin and Tulare Valleys are susceptible to irrigation by diverting the streams from the mountains upon them by means of extensive canals and systems of irrigating ditches, the best lands of the company would have been unsalable to this day, and, like the other portions referred to, would have been regarded as desert lands. So soon as this was made obvious a number of that improvident and speculating class to be found in all communities rushed in upon the lands within the limits of the grant, and, in defiance of the law and the officers of the courts, sought to set up claims as preemptors or technical 'settlers.' Their very presence, their threats as well as their open resistance to the company, with the aid of demagogues who sought to profit by their trespass, made it difficult or impossible for the company to dispose of the lands in the vicinity. In this lawless way the wishes of the railroad company and the purposes of Congress in making the grant were defeated. But for this untoward interruption of the course of law, which has only very slowly been condemned by the executive and judicial officers, the company would have been enabled to transfer into the hands of solid and respectable persons many thousands of acres, and with the traffic derived from their cultivation it would have been able to prosecute the work on the remaining gap in its lines of road."

To June 30, 1880, the cost of construction of the 711.51 miles of railroad owned by this company was $62,919,109.72, and of equipment $1,848,533.81. Total cost, $64,767,643.23, or at an average rate of $91,082 per mile.

*Unsubsidized. †380 miles.

From this recapitulation it will be seen that there remain "unvested," by reason of non-construction of the respective railroads for which grants were made, the following lands:

| | Acres. |
|---|---|
| Northern Pacific | 27,500,000 |
| California and Oregon | 1,781,632 |
| Atlantic and Pacific | 15,868,150 |
| Southern Pacific | 4,757,824 |
| Texas and Pacific | 12,000,000 |

Of these railroads the Northern Pacific, the Atlantic and Pacific, and the Texas and Pacific are vigorously pushing forward the work of construction; and it may be reasonably calculated that these railroads will be completed within the next three years. The California and Oregon uncompleted road extends from Redding to the northern line of the State of California, a distance of about one hundred and fifty miles, and the country there is of such a mountainous character as to require heavy work and great expense, so much so that it is very doubtful if the road will ever be built.

The Southern Pacific uncompleted road extends from Tres Pinos to Huron, across the coast range, a difficult and costly line; and from Mojave to the eastern line of the State of California, at or near a point called "The Needles," over a desert country. Neither of these parts of the Southern Pacific are under construction, and, as in the California and Oregon case, it is very doubtful when they will be built, if ever.

As to the forfeiture of any of these grants, the opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States in the case of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company is given on page 111 of my last annual report.

The Northern Pacific act is similar to that which granted lands to the Atlantic and Pacific in respect to the provisions for any action by Congress looking to a completion of the road.

The Texas and Pacific act contains no provision of the kind referred to, and has no section or clause providing for any repeal of the charter or grants.

The Southern Pacific obtained its grant under the Atlantic and Pacific charter and is subject to the same conditions as that company.

The California and Oregon act, page 178 of Auditor's report for 1880, in section 8, provides that "all the lands not conveyed by patent to said company or companies, as the case may be, at the date of any such failure, shall revert to the United States."

COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, in obedience to the authority given by the concurrent resolution of the two Houses for the purpose of counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, appoints as tellers on the part of the House Mr. HOUSE, of Tennessee, and Mr. CROWLEY, of New York.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause to be read Rule XXVIII governing the order of business for to-day.

The Clerk read as follows:

No standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded or changed without one day's notice of the motion therefor, and no rule shall be suspended except by a vote of two-thirds of the members present, nor shall the Speaker entertain a motion to suspend the rules except on the first and third Mondays of each month after the call of States and Territories shall have been completed, preference being given on the first Monday to individuals and on the third Monday to committees, and during the last six days of a session.

2. All motions to suspend the rules shall, before being submitted to the House, be seconded by a majority by tellers, if demanded.

3. When a motion to suspend the rules has been seconded, it shall be in order, before the final vote is taken thereon, to debate the proposition to be voted upon for thirty minutes, one-half of such time to be given to debate in favor of, and one-half to debate in opposition to, such proposition, and the same right of debate shall be allowed whenever the previous question has been ordered on any proposition on which there has been no debate.

UNITED STATES AND BRITISH PROVINCES RECIPROCITY TREATY.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask to suspend the rules and pass the joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whereas it appears desirable that reciprocal relations should exist between the United States and the British provinces adjacent to our northern frontier, upon a basis assimilating to that of the reciprocal treaty heretofore existing and now abrogated, as far as the present conditions of our industry render desirable, the President of the United States be, and hereby is, authorized to appoint three commissioners, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to confer with other commissioners to be appointed by the Government of Great Britain, whenever it shall be the wish of that government to appoint commissioners on its part; such commissioners on the part of this Government to ascertain and report on what basis a treaty of reciprocal trade for the mutual benefit of the people of the United States and the said provinces can be negotiated.

The SPEAKER. Is there a report accompanying this resolution?

Mr. COX. There is a very lengthy report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that there is a unanimous report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs as to this bill.

Mr. COX. There is a minority report.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair is mistaken.

Mr. MILLS. What is the question pending?

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts s to suspend the rules and put upon its passage the joint resolution with amendments as reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs and just read by the Clerk.

Mr. MILLS. Is it open for debate?

The SPEAKER. It will be under the rule if the motion to suspend is seconded by tellers. The Chair is informed that the committee recommend certain amendments, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee recommend that the following words be stricken out:

"Whereas it appears desirable that reciprocal relations should exist between the United States and the British provinces adjacent to our northern frontier, upon a basis assimilating to that of the reciprocal treaty heretofore existing and now abrogated, as far as the present conditions of our industry render desirable."

Also, in line 9, strike out the word "authorized" and insert "requested;" in line 15 strike out the words "a treaty of," and in line 17 strike out the word "negotiated" and insert "established."

With the proposed amendments the joint resolution reads as follows:

"Resolved, &c., That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, requested to appoint three commissioners, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to confer with other commissioners to be appointed by the Government of Great Britain, whenever it shall be the wish of that government to appoint commissioners on its part; such commissioners on the part of this Government to ascertain and report on what basis reciprocal trade, for the mutual benefit of the people of the United States and the said provinces, can be established."

Mr. BREWER. I ask for the reading of the report accompanying that resolution.

Mr. BLAND. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLAND. This is a motion to suspend the rules and pass the joint resolution. That motion has not yet been adopted. If that motion be adopted it suspends all the rules, also the rule, if there be one, authorizing the reading of this report without objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot understand why a report of the House which is directed to be made by the House, and required to be made in accordance with the rules of the House, should not be read as explaining the provisions of the measure to which it relates, if demanded. The Chair can conceive of no other object in making the report. It is, in fact, part of the record coming from the committee.

Mr. BLAND. The report accompanying the resolution is no part of the question on which a vote is to be taken. If fifteen minutes be allowed for debate upon the resolution, and the report is read within the fifteen minutes, it will probably come within the language of the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not take it out of the fifteen minutes allowed for debate.

Mr. BLAND. It might take all day to read it. I object to its reading. I have a right to object to it. This is a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. MURCH. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that this is a committee report. The time for reading the report should not come out of the fifteen minutes if it is a committee report. If it is an individual report the time of the reading of the report should come out of the time allowed for individual discussion upon it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see any distinction if the report is authorized in manner as has been stated by the Chair. The Chair thinks that the reading of the report is a right which can be demanded.

Mr. BLAND. Unless it is in order one objection would prevent its being read. I say that it is not in order under a motion to suspend the rules. The Chair will remember that the mere motion to suspend the rules does not suspend them. The rules we apply to this are still in force.

Mr. BRIGHT. Let me suggest, Mr. Speaker, that in my judgment the reading of the report is but a part of the record of the case.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has so held.

Mr. BLAND. The point that I make is that no debate is allowed on the motion to suspend the rules. This is a motion to suspend the rules, and the reading of the report is in the nature of debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that under the new rules, the gentleman will remember, fifteen minutes' debate is allowed on the motion to suspend the rules and pass a measure.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the resolution proposed be read again.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is perfectly idle to read the resolution unless members are silent in the House.

Mr. COX. I think I can solve this question by one word. This is the day for individual motions to suspend the rules. This report comes from the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes this on his own individual responsibility. I submit, therefore, the report need not necessarily be read to-day, even though some member call for the reading of it.

Mr. BLAND. The point I make is that the report can only be read as a part of the fifteen minutes' debate on each side allowed by the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause to be read Rule XXXI.

The Clerk read as follows:

When the reading of a paper other than one upon which the House is called to give a final vote is demanded, and the same is objected to by any member, it shall be determined without debate by a vote of the House.

Mr. BLAND. That is one of the rules of the House, and it is a rule which can be suspended.

The SPEAKER. It is not yet suspended.

Mr. BLAND. This is a motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend does not suspend the rules. Before the House actually votes to suspend the rules, the rules are not suspended.

Mr. CONGER. I submit to the Chair, that if the question of reading the report from a committee on a measure sought to be passed is to be determined by the House, then the value of having a report from a committee would be in a great measure lost. I do not think the Chair has ever decided that the rule applies to the reading of reports of committees when the question is on the passage of the bill or resolution to which the report relates.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is clearly of opinion the report ought to be read, but under Rule XXXI he proposes to submit that question to the House.

Mr. CONGER. If the reading of the report can be demanded as a right, the Chair should not submit the question to the House, whether it should be read, but should rule that it must be read.

The SPEAKER. This is perhaps not a paper "upon which the House is called to give a final vote," as described in Rule XXXI, but it is clearly part of the record from the committee.

Mr. CONGER. I desire the resolution to be again read.

Mr. RICE. I rise to ask a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RICE. Can the views of the minority be read as well as the report of the committee?

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes they would be read also.

Mr. RICE. Both should be read, if either.

Mr. BLAND. It is well understood, pending a motion to suspend the rules, no debate is in order on that motion.

The SPEAKER. On the contrary, the new rules provide that thirty minutes' debate be allowed.

Mr. BLAND. I had not got through with my statement. The new rules only make this exception: that the proposition may be debated for thirty minutes, fifteen minutes in favor of it and fifteen minutes on the other side. And I submit that the reading of the report can come in under that debate and in no other way.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks that the resolution be again read. The Clerk will again report it.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. BOWMAN. If I may be allowed to make a suggestion I think we can do away with the reading of the report. The gentlemen who are in favor of this resolution and those who take the lead in representing the opposition to it I understand are willing to dispense with the reading of the report and to have the matter explained on the floor during the half hour allowed for debate. I hope no one will insist on the reading of the report. We will have half an hour for debate after the motion is seconded.

Mr. BREWER. I insist on the reading of the report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the question to the House whether the paper shall be read.

Mr. DUNNELL. I doubt whether the House understands the question to be submitted, as there has been a good deal of disorder.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWMAN] moves to suspend the rules and pass a joint resolution coming from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, unanimously recommended by that committee.

Mr. COX. Not unanimously.

The SPEAKER. The Chair begs pardon and corrects himself. There are minority views.

Mr. RICE. A large minority.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BREWER] demands the reading of the report of the committee. Under Rule XXXI, which the Chair has caused to be read, the Chair now proposes to submit the question as to the reading of the report to be determined by the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. I submit to the Chair that this being a motion to suspend the rules includes that rule as well as others.

The SPEAKER. But the rules are not suspended until the motion is carried, and the Chair thinks these reports are part of the record from the committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the Chair to allow me one moment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. SPRINGER. This is a motion to suspend the rules. Under the rule which allows the gentleman from Massachusetts to make his motion it is provided there shall be allowed on either side so much time for discussion. Now, the reading of this report is in the nature of debate, but it must come within the rule in regard to motions to suspend the rules which allows a certain amount of debate on either side. This is not the time for that debate. Therefore it is not in order to demand the reading of this report to the exclusion of all other business; nor is it competent for the Chair to submit that question to the House previous to the motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the report is part of the record of the case; but he thinks it is that part of the record which, under Rule XXXI, the House by a majority vote has a right to dispense with.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the Chair whether the reading of the report is not in the nature of debate?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not called upon to decide that point at present.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call upon the Chair to decide that point now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not decide except what he is required to decide. The majority of the House can determine by their vote whether the report shall be read or not.

Mr. BLAND. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLAND. How can a majority of the House do away with a rule?

The SPEAKER. The rule says a majority shall determine as to the reading.

Mr. BLAND. The majority of the House cannot suspend a rule.

The SPEAKER. But the rules are not yet suspended. This, the Chair thinks, is a part of the record; and the reading of the report, when demanded, should be determined by the House. Otherwise a precedent might be established which might be dangerous in the future.

Mr. BLAND. It takes a two-thirds vote to suspend the rules and direct the reading of the report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks his decision is an equitable one, and in accordance with fair play and common sense.

Mr. ROBINSON. I wish to ask the Chair whether the question to be submitted to the House as to the reading of the report carries with it the reading of the views of the minority?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks both.

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire further to ask the Chair whether an appeal is pending, and whether the House is voting on any appeal from the decision of the Chair at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know of any. There may be an appeal upon another question of business, not now before the House.

Mr. ROBINSON. I made that inquiry because the House should understand that this vote does not settle this question for the future; only that the House will or will not hear this report read. If the Chair should now make a ruling on the question——

The SPEAKER. The Chair makes no ruling, except to submit under Rule XXXI the question of the reading of this paper to a vote of the House. Any other ruling of the Chair would be arbitrary, and would take away from the majority of the House the power to control its own business.

Mr. RICE. I understand that includes the views of the minority as well as the report of the majority.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so stated. The question now is, Will the House dispense with the reading of the report of the committee?

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 73, noes 77.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. SPARKS said: A number of gentlemen around me have voted by mistake.

The SPEAKER. That is their own fault, not the fault of the Chair. On dispensing with the reading of the report there are—ayes 73, noes 77.

Mr. BLAND. I call for tellers on that question.

The question was taken upon ordering tellers, and there were 31 in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative being one-fifth of a quorum) tellers were ordered, and Mr. BLAND and Mr. BOWMAN were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 93, noes 69.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. CLYMER called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being 41 in the affirmative; more than one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. FORT. I would like to have the question again stated by the Chair, as many gentlemen do not understand it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion that the House dispense with the reading of the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs upon the joint resolution, for the passage of which a suspension of the rules has been moved.

Mr. FORT. That would include the minority report also?

The SPEAKER. It would.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 162, nays 84, not voting 46; as follows:

YEAS—162.

At the conclusion of the second roll-call,

Mr. CAMP objected.

The Clerk proceeded to read the names of those voting; after which

The following pairs were announced:

Mr. HERNDON with Mr. HAWLEY, for the day, on political questions, each reserving the right to vote to make a quorum.

Mr. KLOTZ with Mr. MILLER, until Wednesday.

Mr. RICHMOND with Mr. JORGENSEN.

Mr. HAMMOND, of New York, with Mr. SMITH, of New Jersey.

Mr. OVERTON with Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee.

Mr. MILES with Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois.

Mr. CASWELL with Mr. BACHMAN.

Mr. JAMES with Mr. O'BRIEN.

Mr. SMITH, of Georgia, with Mr. WILBER, on political questions.

Mr. HURD with Mr. BUTTERWORTH.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. MILES. I call for a second of that motion.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. MILLS and Mr. BOWMAN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 33, noes 119.

So the motion to suspend the rules was not seconded.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair next recognizes the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. AIKEN.]

Mr. AIKEN. I was instructed by the Committee on Agriculture——

The SPEAKER. This is not the day for motions from committees to suspend the rules.

Mr. AIKEN. I was instructed by the Committee on Agriculture to present the bill which I now send to the desk on the third Monday of January last. The committee was not then called; and now, upon my own responsibility I present the bill and ask the House by a two-thirds vote to pass it.

The Clerk was proceeding to read the title of the bill, when

Mr. CARLISLE said: Mr. Speaker, on the day assigned to motions by individual members to suspend the rules is it in order for the gentleman to take a bill which his committee has directed him to report and send that up?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. CARLISLE. Because, as the Chair will see, at once——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina will give his attention. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] makes the point of order that as this is the day for individual motions to suspend the rules, the gentleman from South Carolina should not have recognition when his committee has actually given the instruction to make the motion for suspension. The Chair supposed that the gentleman sought the floor as an individual member to make the motion.

Mr. VALENTINE. The gentleman states that he makes the motion now on his own individual responsibility.

Mr. AIKEN. I ask the Chair, for information, why is it that when I am recognized I am not as much entitled as any other member to move a suspension of the rules for the passage of this bill?

The SPEAKER. Because the gentleman stated that he was acting under instruction from his committee.

Mr. AIKEN. I stated no such thing.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understood.

Mr. AIKEN. The Chair is mistaken.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will go to the record.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman stated that he was instructed by his committee to make this motion in January last, but that he now makes the motion on his own responsibility. I submit, however, that the point is the same. When a committee has taken charge of a bill and instructed its chairman to move its passage under a suspension of the rules on a particular day, and upon that day the committee is not reached, the bill ought to go over until the next day when that kind of business is in order.

Mr. CARLISLE. Otherwise the effect would be to give the committee two chances. When a gentleman fails to have his committee called, he will then undertake to offer his bill as an individual; and if he fails to get the floor as an individual, then on the next day he will offer the bill as a bill of the committee.

Mr. HASKELL. Why is not that the gentleman's right? When a gentleman has obtained recognition of the Speaker and as his own personal privilege and demand asks for a suspension of the rules on a particular subject, who is to question his statement? It is just as much his right to move a suspension of the rules under such circumstances as though no committee had acted on the bill. The gentleman stands here on his individual right.

Mr. KENNA. I desire to ask a question. Suppose the time should come in the history of this session when there could be no further possible opportunity for a committee to move to suspend the rules, what is there in the rules to prevent an individual member in such case from offering in his own right a bill that may have been prepared by such a committee?

Mr. CARLISLE. The committee might reconsider its action.

Mr. KENNA. That adds strength to my proposition that it is the individual right of the member to offer a bill and have a vote of the House upon it without regard to the action of the committee.

Mr. AIKEN. I had no instruction from the committee further than to ask for a suspension of the rules on the third Monday in January to pass this bill. It was not called, and I thought it was nothing but right and candid to say to the House that instruction had been given to me by the committee. I now, upon my own responsibility, ask that the bill be put upon its passage without regard to the action heretofore of the Committee on Agriculture. I cannot see why I have not that right as well as any other man on this floor. It matters not whether that bill is in the hands of the committee or not. They may keep it till doomsday. I desire it to-day put upon its passage. I move that the rules be suspended and the bill be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The difficulty is one the gentleman has made himself in stating that the committee acted on the subject with a view to have the House suspend the rules.

Mr. AIKEN. That is not a portion of my motion at all. I beg pardon of the Chair, but he misunderstands my motive. If it had been an adverse report from the Committee on Agriculture, I hold I would not have been allowed to present it. It was a favorable report from the committee; but inasmuch as the committee failed to effect what they desired, I now, as an individual member, ask permission, having received recognition from the Chair, to have it put upon its passage without reference to what the committee has done or may do. I think it nothing more than the right I have.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 4909) for the creation of a Department of Agriculture.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Department of Agriculture, established at the seat of government of the United States, shall be an Executive Department under the supervision and control of a Secretary of Agriculture, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall receive the same annual compensation, and in like manner, as the Secretaries of the other Executive Departments of the Government.

SEC. 2. That there shall be in the Department of Agriculture an Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, who shall be a practical agriculturist, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall perform such duties in said Department as may be prescribed by the Secretary or may be required by law, and who shall be entitled to an annual salary of $3,500.

SEC. 3. That there shall be in the Department of Agriculture a veterinary division, under the control of a veterinary surgeon, subject to the authority of the Secretary, to which division shall be referred all matters pertaining to the inspection of imported or exported live stock, and to the investigation of the causes, existence, and treatment of diseases among animals; and said surgeon shall receive an annual salary of $3,000.

SEC. 4. That there shall be in the Department of Agriculture a division of entomology, under the supervision of an entomologist, whose duty it shall be, subject to the control of the Secretary, to investigate the habits of all destructive insects, and to collect such statistics as will show their effect upon the textile, cereal, and other crops of the United States; and said entomologist shall receive an annual salary of $3,000.

SEC. 5. That in addition to the duties required of the Commissioner of Agriculture under existing law, it shall be the further duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to collect, collate, and submit to Congress, at every regular session, the agricultural statistics of the United States, including those relating to labor and the prices paid for the same; to the transportation and freight of agricultural products, live stock, and manufactured articles; and to the location and number of manufactures, with their sources of raw material and their markets.

SEC. 6. That all laws and parts of laws relating to the Department of Agriculture now in existence, as far as the same are applicable and not in conflict with this act, are continued in full force and effect.

Mr. COVERT. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. COVERT and Mr. AIKEN as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 95, noes 66.

So the motion was seconded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN] as in charge of the bill. Fifteen minutes is allowed on each side. The Chair has suggested heretofore that ten minutes be taken in advocacy and fifteen against the proposition, and that the last five minutes remain to those who are in favor of the proposition.

Mr. AIKEN. I do not desire to consume the time of the House, having already during this Congress addressed myself to this subject. I now yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. MULDROW.]

A MEMBER. The gentleman is not in the House.

Mr. AIKEN. I yield the other five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. UPDEGRAFF.]

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio, addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Several MEMBERS. Let us have a vote.

Mr. AIKEN. In the absence of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. MULDROW,] and not wishing to take up the time of the House myself, I will yield the floor to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COVERT,] chairman of the Committee on Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has fifteen minutes in opposition.

Mr. COVERT. Mr. Speaker, I occupy to some extent an embarrassing position so far as my action on the pending bill is concerned. I have the honor to be chairman of the committee from which this bill emanates. I had the pleasure of participating with my associates on that committee in the discussion which led to the formulation and adoption of the bill now before the House. I assume, sir, that perhaps the only important argument which is submitted for the adoption of this measure is in the fact that a large proportion of the people of this country who are engaged in industrial pursuits are engaged in some one branch of the business of agriculture. It seems to me therein lies one great reason why this bill should not be adopted by this House and should not be enacted into law. We have, sir, the spectacle presented of a large class of the people, already strong in numbers, strong in material resources and abundantly able to protect their own interests, clamoring for the elevation of this department and for the dispensing of special favors to them, when, with the same glance, we see our commercial interests lying prostrate and our manufacturing interests by no means such as they should be, yet no demand comes up from those engaged either in commerce or manufactures asking special governmental intervention in their behalf.

Mr. BLAND. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

Mr. COVERT. Certainly.

Mr. BLAND. I would like to ask the gentleman if nearly every manufacturing and industrial interest in the country is not now protected, except——

Mr. COVERT. I was referring, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BLAND. I ask the gentleman from New York if it is not true that nearly every interest in this country is not now protected, excepting the farming interest?

Mr. COVERT. I was about to say, Mr. Speaker, that the remarks I have made had reference solely and entirely to the subject of direct governmental aid, which is invoked in favor of certain classes of our people engaged in industrial pursuits. I know the argument is used by those in favor of this bill that other countries have adopted this system of governmental aid in this direction. But I beg to say to gentlemen who use this as an argument that our theory of government is fashioned upon another plan, upon another system, and is of an entirely different sort from those governments abroad which extend special aid in these various directions. In England, in France, and in other European countries they extend governmental subsidies in various directions that would not be dreamed of in our country. They extend governmental aid to art, to music, to the drama, as well as to various departments of labor which, under our system of government, would not receive any consideration of that character. The design of the framers and founders of our Constitution was that every person and every class of industry here should stand entirely upon its own basis, without reference to governmental aid or special privileges. There is absolutely no warrant in the Constitution for the so-called "elevation" of this Department of Agriculture, and no warrant even for the establishment or existence of a Department of Agriculture as it stands to-day.

That Department, Mr. Speaker, stands to-day as the illegitimate child of this Government; and while every child, illegitimate or otherwise, is entitled to support during its infancy, so I have very cheerfully given, as other gentlemen have given, support to the Department of Agriculture so long as its existence was maintained and the statute creating it remained unrepealed upon the statute-book. But when we are asked here to go a step beyond this, to go and deliberately erect this Department into a still higher one and make it a Cabinet department, then I desire to record my emphatic opposition to the measure. I say, without fear of successful contradiction, that this request is not made by the real agriculturists of this country or by any relatively large number of thoughtful or intelligent men engaged in that business throughout the length and breadth of this land. The intelligent and thoughtful farmer belongs to his local grange, to his town, county, or State agricultural society, and has the benefit of periodicals and newspapers published specially for his uses and his needs. These give him the latest experimental information on all questions in which he takes an interest in connection with his business. He is self-reliant, and does not come to besiege the doors of Congress asking that this be made a Cabinet department or that the Commissioner be made a Cabinet officer under the Government.

I make the prophecy here and now that if this bill is enacted into a law, if this position is elevated to a Cabinet position, it will become a political engine rather than a department of the Government intended to foster and promote the interests of agriculture. Where, sir, is the necessity of this Department as contemplated in this bill? Under the law as it stands to-day the Commissioner of Agriculture, while he has not a seat in the Cabinet, yet makes his reports directly to the President. There is not a single message coming from the Executive to Congress that does not make reference in some way to the agricultural interests and needs of the country founded upon these reports which the Commissioner sends in. He stands now in that respect as he would stand if he were elevated to a Cabinet position, as the agency between the Executive and Congress, through which these suggestions looking to the agricultural needs of the country come for consideration. If this Department were made a Cabinet appointment, he could do nothing more than he does now. He could do no more than that if he had a seat in the Cabinet. I submit that if he held a Cabinet position he could do no more in the cause of agriculture than he has been enabled to do holding his present position. The only difference would be that according to the terms of this bill there would be a multitude of minor officers under his immediate control, a whole corps of subordinates, which would be constantly increasing in numbers, all to be paid at the Government expense, and thereby creating positions that might be given out as a reward for party services rendered or to come. And the spectacle would be presented of this Department, originally designed to induce thought and experimental action on the part of the agriculturists of this country, a bureau intended merely as an experimental department according to the terms of the act creating it—the spectacle would be presented, I say, of this institution, originally intended to subserve good purposes, becoming a mere political position to be offered or awarded to somebody for political services.

Mr. DUNNELL. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. REAGAN. I hope the gentleman will not be interrupted in the short time allowed him.

Mr. DUNNELL. I merely wish to ask the gentleman why, if this should be made a Cabinet position, it should make it any more a political engine or department than any other Department of the Government?

Mr. COVERT. I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. DUNNELL. I mean properly conducted under the law.

Mr. COVERT. I will give to my friend from Minnesota the reasons that have induced me to take the stand that I do in reference to this matter, and I beg to assure him and this House that I have given to this question very considerable thought, and I did that because I regarded it as a very important question for our consideration. I will tell my friend from Minnesota that if this is made an Executive Department—a Cabinet position—that the various offices under the control of the Department will be parceled out as rewards for party service. I submit, sir, that such a change as is contemplated would transform the Department into a medium for dispensing political favors and conferring political rewards.

We find the law as it exists upon our statute-book to-day provides for a comparatively cheap and inexpensive medium through which and by which information on agricultural topics can be submitted to the people. The Commissioner is paid a reasonable salary for his services. The Committee on Agriculture in formulating their appropriation bills have adhered to the organic law by which this department was created; and we have been economical and saving in the adjustment of the salaries of its officers.

This bill upon which we are now called suddenly to act transforms the Commissioner into a Secretary of Agriculture, with the same compensation as is given to Secretaries of other Executive Departments of the Government. It creates additional officers. An assistant secretary is provided at a salary of $3,500. A veterinary division is established of a permanent character, with a corps of officers and attachés, and permanency is given to the entomological bureau. The secretary to be created is made to watch and report upon the condition of the labor market, and upon the details of freight tariffs and other business questions. All these details, which I have not the time now to enumerate, much less to dwell upon, will call for the appointment of men to public places. This bill, framed in the way I have thus briefly attempted to outline, is not in harmony with the object and the purpose for which this department was originally created. I defy any gentleman on this floor to read that organic act carefully and refrain from the conclusion that this department was intended as a temporary and experimental department only. By this bill its commendable purposes are sought to be changed so that it shall become a medium for dispensing political favors. I claim there is nothing in the Constitution to warrant what is sought to be brought about by the passage of this law.

Mr. DUNNELL. I submit to the gentleman that he has not yet answered my question.

Mr. COVERT. I beg to say to my friend from Minnesota that I have attempted to answer his question directly and fully. When this proposition is presented to us, that the department as at present constituted meets the demands made upon it and fully subserves the purposes of the organic act which led to its existence, and when this proposed bill seeks to largely increase the number of officials and augment their salaries, what conclusion can be reached except the very proposition my friend from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] seeks to combat?

Holding as I do, Mr. Speaker, that there is no authority and absolutely no warrant in the Constitution for the creation of an executive department of that character; believing that this action is not pressed by any large majority of really thoughtful, intelligent, and practical agriculturists; and believing moreover that the agricultural needs of the country are abundantly subserved by the existing department, rendering further action unnecessary, I most sincerely hope the House will not agree to the passage of the proposed measure. I yield now to my friend from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.]

Mr. REAGAN. I am not unfriendly to the creation of a new department of the Government. Indeed I favor the creation of a new department of the Government, but I do not favor the present bill. This bill is simply an enlargement of the powers of the Agricultural Bureau and the making the Commissioner of Agriculture a Cabinet officer.

The subject is one of very great moment. The agricultural, the commercial, the manufacturing, and the mining interests of this country ought, it seems to me, to be placed under a separate and independent department of the Government, which I would call the Department of Industry, in order to embrace the whole of them. And doing that the bill ought to provide for transferring the different bureaus in the Interior, the Treasury, and the War Departments to this new department of the Government. With that done, the great agricultural interests of the country, its great commercial interests, its great manufacturing interests, its great mining interests would receive the supervision and direction of a first-class man; and undoubtedly they deserve the supervision of such a man. But this bill falls far below these purposes. It looks not to any great increase of the efficiency of the Agricultural Bureau, but simply to changing its name. I do not see the necessity of changing the name of the office of Commissioner of Agriculture without changing the law, without doing something to promote the welfare of the country in connection with the agricultural interest.

When we come to see that the agriculture of this country embraces a very large part of its business, when we come to see the large interests in manufactures, the large interests in commerce and in mining, that are mere appendages to the other Departments of the Government, that are attached by accident, as it were, we see that it is not practicable for the heads of the Departments to give the attention to these interests which they require. For instance, many of the duties that should be transferred to a department of industry are under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury. I do not care what the power of intellect or what the learning of the Secretary of the Treasury may be, it is not practicable for him to give to the duties of the Secretary of the Treasury Department proper the consideration which is necessary and then to bestow upon commerce, upon manufactures—I am not sure if the mining interests are connected with that Department—the consideration that is due to these great interests.

I shall vote against this bill because it is a changing of the name of an officer and of the salary and dignity of the office without conferring that benefit upon the great material interests of this country that they have a right to expect and demand when we create a new department of the Government.

Mr. HATCH rose.

The SPEAKER. The time of debate adverse to the bill has expired.

Mr. HATCH. I rise to favor the passage of the bill. The time allowed for debate in favor of the bill has not yet been occupied.

Mr. AIKEN. I ask the Chair how much time I can control?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman has twelve minutes remaining.

Mr. AIKEN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. HATCH.]

Mr. WHITE. How much time has been consumed in opposition to the bill?

The SPEAKER. Fifteen minutes.

Mr. CLYMER. I understood the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN] yielded the floor absolutely. He made no reservation of the time which had not been occupied.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from South Carolina cannot change the rule which allows fifteen minutes in advocacy of the measure; and the time allowed for debate in favor of the measure has not been consumed. The Chair thinks the waiver by the gentleman from South Carolina should not have force.

Mr. CLYMER. He yielded five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. UPDEGRAFF.]

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Ohio only occupied two minutes.

Mr. AIKEN. I did not desire to consume any portion of the time and yielded the floor to the opposition. I think the House has control of the remaining portion of those fifteen minutes.

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. WHITE. With all deference to the Chair, I think there are two minutes left not consumed by those who are opposed to the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was advised by the Clerk keeping the time that the time on that side has been exhausted.

Mr. VALENTINE. It has and two minutes over, for I kept the time.

Mr. WHITE. I think another two minutes should be allowed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to extend fifteen to seventeen minutes.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire to ask the Chair whether a proposition to enlarge the scope of this bill would be considered as being in opposition to it?

The SPEAKER. No amendment is in order. This is a motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. ROBESON. That is all I want to know.

The SPEAKER. And that motion cuts off debate except for the thirty minutes provided by the rule. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] is entitled to the floor for five minutes.

Mr. HATCH. I desire to say to the House that it was not the purpose of that portion of the Committee on Agriculture who favor the passage of this bill to consume the time allotted to the gentleman moving a suspension of the rules, if such time had been desired by other members of the House. But inasmuch as the chairman of the committee [Mr. COVERT] has seen fit to consume most of the time allotted to the opposition, I desire to say to the House that that gentleman is not the only member of the committee who has given to this question grave and earnest consideration.

When he comes in here and says to the House that there is no warrant in the Constitution of the United States for the erection of this Department as proposed by this bill, I answer him that there is nothing in the Constitution to prohibit the elevation of the bureau having charge of the great agricultural interests of the country into an Executive Department. If there is nothing specifically authorizing it, there is surely no prohibition in the Constitution against it.

But I insist that it comes within the scope and operation of that provision of the Constitution which affirms that Congress shall have power to provide for the "general welfare of the United States," and that further general provision which declares the power of Congress—

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

The same power that was exercised by Congress in 1849 when it declared the Interior Department an executive one, and in fact the same power invoked to create and regulate all the Executive Departments.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. COVERT] says that the Department of Agriculture is an illegitimate child. If that be so, then in the name of the great agricultural interests of this country let the Forty-sixth Congress of the United States do to-day the grandest act of its official life and legitimize this child of agriculture. Illegitimate! If it is so, it has done more for the country than any other child that has been born to it since the Declaration of Independence. It is the foundation of our wealth, the corner-stone of our prosperity, and the fruitful source from which we derive our richest and surest revenues.

Now what is this proposition? It is not, as the gentleman from New York seems to suppose, a proposition to create a piece of merely political machinery, a bureau of politicians. It is to dignify as it deserves and to enlarge the interests of agriculture by making the Commissioner of Agriculture a Cabinet officer. And why not do it? What valid objection has been presented to the House why it should not be done?

The gentleman says the agricultural interests of this country do not need this protection, because they are large enough to protect themselves. I reply to the gentleman that every other important interest of this country except agriculture has a voice directly or indirectly in the Cabinet. Every other interest except agriculture has an organized system in the Government to look after its welfare and promote its advancement. The fact that the agricultural interests are large and diversified is the very reason why it should have a representative in the Cabinet. Enlarge this great industry, exalt it, add to its importance and secure justice to it. I hope that at least two-thirds, if not nine-tenths of the House will vote in favor of the bill.

I now yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] the remainder of my time.

Mr. DUNNELL. I shall support this measure, although it does not embrace all the interests that ought to be embraced in the creation of a new department. I agree with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] that there should be a department to be denominated the department of industry, which should embrace not agriculture alone, but manufactures, mining, and commerce as well.

No one Department of this Government has now under its charge the great productive forces of this country. These interests to which I have alluded are the productive forces of the country and they should be presided over by one man. "Industries" embrace not only agriculture, but manufactures and commerce and mining.

I wonder that so many years have passed without the creation of a department having in charge specifically these great material interests of the country. The Treasury Department is now overloaded with business. The bureau or department of commerce should be severed from the Treasury Department, and, together with agriculture and the other interests to which I have alluded, should be consolidated in one department.

Five minutes is too little time in which to even allude to the great interests which are involved in this question. Out of the earth comes really all our national wealth. Out of the earth come the great resources of the people. The Treasury would be poor were it not for agriculture, for mining, and for commerce. These three great interests fill up the Treasury, pay our national debt, sustain our national credit, and give us character at home and abroad.

A department of industry is what is demanded at the present time. I vote for this bill in the hope that it will be the beginning of such a department.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. COVERT] says there is no authority in the Constitution for the creation of this department. Why, sir, we have created a Department of Justice, we have created a Post-Office Department, we have created a Department of the Interior, under the old Constitution, without amendment to that Constitution, by force and operation of law. The Constitution gives to the President the power to appoint secretaries as they may be provided from time to time by process of law.

We have reached a period in our history since the close of the war when we ought, I think, to devote more attention to the material interests of the country. Into this department could be carried the railroad interests of the country. In some bureau of that department this great question, now looming up before the American people of interstate commerce could find its place, its protection, and its proper direction.

I have one minute of my time left, I believe, and I yield it to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCOID] who desires to speak.

Mr. McCOID. I want, in the minute given me, only to say that I hope this bill will pass. The agricultural interests of this country ought to be given at least equal prominence with the many other interests for which Departments have been created with secretaries at their heads.

We have an Army of 25,000 men which is recognized in this way and given a secretaryship. We have an insignificant Navy which is recognized in the same way. The vast agricultural interests of this country in which perhaps more people are interested than in any other ought likewise to be recognized, ought to be given the same prominence.

I am in favor of the principle of this bill. It may not be perfect in its present form, it may not include enough. We ought to have a secretary of agriculture; we ought to have a bureau of entomology, we ought to have in it a bureau of transportation and other bureaus. We ought at least to begin now by the passage of this bill, and we can then perfect the measure in the future.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. Speaker, have I any time to dispose of?

The SPEAKER. About two minutes, the Chair thinks.

Mr. AIKEN. I yield that time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. [Mr. GODSHALK.]

Mr. GODSHALK. Mr. Speaker, the two minutes allowed me to speak on this bill are entirely too little to do justice to the subject. Still, I want to say that the interests of agriculture are now so overshadowing in this country that in my judgment the time has come for this House to consider patiently and impartially the importance of the question presented by this bill. I do not pretend to say that the bill is perfect in form or details; but I do say that the time has come when this country should take up the subject of agriculture as of national concern, and consider it as related to the departments of this Government.

It has been said during this debate that there is no warrant in the Constitution for the creation of this particular department. But I want gentlemen to remember that all the Departments of this Government have grown up with the needs of the country. The Department of the Interior is of comparatively recent date; so with others. They have grown up as the country needed them. It must be apparent to the House, I think, that the interests involved in this question are more important than any that has occupied the attention of the House recently. Why, sir, look at our agricultural exports. We are about to appropriate several millions of dollars—perhaps $10,000,000—to the improvement of our rivers and harbors, for what purpose? Why, that the commerce of the country may find its way to the sea, and that foreign commerce may find its way into our ports.

What has gone to make up the great body of our exports? Why, sir, the agricultural productions of the country. When the country was struggling in the slough of despond—when there appeared to be nothing before us but gloom and disaster—the agricultural interests of the country, the plow and the reaper, came to our aid; and thus we are raised to-day to a pinnacle where we have been able to resume specie payments and to present a spectacle of prosperity and happiness that is rarely witnessed in the history of nations.

Now, as I said before, it is probable that in this bill we have not a perfected measure such as the country may require at some future time; but let us take to-day the first step in the right direction. It cannot be urged that this measure will increase public expenditures to an unwarrantable extent. The amount of money involved cannot be taken into account when compared with the mighty interests which this bill seeks to recognize and promote.

This country is to-day the granary of the nations, and the amount we can supply of cereals and meats to the markets of the world is the first factor to determine the quantity and price of food for a large portion of the human race. Look, if you please, at this Union of States, as the recent census presents it; its fifty millions of people, its vast expanse of arable land, embracing every variety of climate, its iron roads spanning the continent, furnishing the means of moving to market the products of the husbandman, and it will be perceived at once how largely every advance we shall make in practical agriculture must contribute to the prosperity of this country, and give it an enduring basis upon which to rest. Do not understand me to imply that this measure is, in my opinion, indispensable to progress in good farming; not at all. Millions of intelligent minds, with much practical knowledge already acquired, and anxious to learn more, find pleasure, I hope, in this noblest science, but they think they may well ask the National Legislature to aid them by judicious legislation.

Mr. HERBERT. As I have not had an opportunity to be heard on this bill, I ask leave to print some remarks on it.

There being no objection, leave was granted. [See Appendix.]

Mr. SIMONTON. I ask similar leave.

There being no objection, leave was granted. [See Appendix.]

Mr. BREWER. I suggest that unanimous consent be given to all members who may desire it to print remarks on this subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BREWER] asks unanimous consent that all members of the House desiring to print remarks on the bill under consideration may have leave to do so. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. ROBESON. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order for me at this time to make a motion enlarging the compass of this bill, extending it to trade and commerce, industry and labor?

The SPEAKER. Upon a motion to suspend the rules no amendment is in order. The question will now be taken on the motion to suspend the rules so as to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of this bill and pass it.

Mr. BREWER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 164, nays 83, not voting 45; as follows:

YEAS—164.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

FORFEITURE OF VESSELS FOR BREACH OF REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. FRYE. I move to suspend the rules so as to take from the Calendar of the Whole House on the state of the Union and consider the bill (S. No. 939) to amend the law relative to the seizure and forfeiture of vessels for breach of the revenue laws.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to take up this bill for consideration or for passage under a supension of the rules?

Mr. FRYE. The Committee on Ways and Means, in reporting the bill, recommended an amendment striking out the words "seizure or," but subsequently, on reconsideration, instructed me to withdraw that amendment. Now, if the bill can be taken from the Calendar and passed without the amendment, I will make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can make the motion to pass the bill in that form. The effect of suspending the rules to consider the bill might be to exclude from recognition many other gentlemen whom the Chair desires to recognize.

Mr. FRYE. Then I modify my motion so as to take the bill from the Calendar and pass it without the amendment.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That no vessel used by any person or corporation as common carriers in the transaction of their business as such common carriers shall be subject to seizure or forfeiture by force of the provisions of title 34 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, unless it shall appear that the owner or master of such vessel at the time of the alleged illegal act was a consenting party or privy thereto.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, has this bill been considered by a committee of this House?

Mr. FRYE. It has been. It was reported unanimously in the Senate by the Committee on Finance, and has been reported unanimously in this House by the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. COX. I have no objection to the bill; but I would like to hear the amendment.

Mr. CARLISLE. After this bill had been reported with an amendment, the Committee on Ways and Means took up the matter again for consideration, and determined, I believe, that the amendment ought not to be adopted.

Mr. MORRISON. That the bill was better without it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was advised that the bill was brought before the House with the unanimous approval of the Committee on Ways and Means, having been approved in the same way by the Finance Committee of the Senate. It now comes before the House for passage without the amendment, the Committee on Ways and Means having reconsidered its action recommending the amendment.

Mr. COX. This bill is intended to protect vessels which may have contraband on board if the intention of the owners be innocent.

Mr. FRYE. Or master. If neither owner nor master is privy at all, then the vessel cannot be seized or forfeited; but if they are privy it can be seized and forfeited as it is now.

Mr. COX. I have no objection.

The rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the bill was passed.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. REAGAN. I move the rules be suspended and the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, be passed.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. SCALES, (interrupting.) Mr. Speaker, is it in order to raise a point of order after the bill has been read?

The SPEAKER. It will be.

Mr. SCALES. Then I desire to raise that point of order when the Clerk has finished the reading of the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

This bill appropriates $10,179,800.

The SPEAKER. The report will now be read.

Mr. SCALES. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I do not make this point of order in any captious spirit. I do not make it out of hostility to the bill. I do it only to ascertain how the rule is to be construed and how we are to be guided in future, to learn from the Chair the extent of the decision he has already made in reference to the bill reported by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN] from the Committee on Agriculture.

The point I make is, that this is the day when preference should be given to individuals to suspend the rules rather than to committees. I do not think this is the same point of order raised, or rather it did not have the same application when the Chair decided the other question as it does to this bill. That bill was not in committee. It had been reported from the committee and was in the House. The Agricultural Committee had no longer any control over that bill. It was in the control of the House, and any gentleman had the right as an individual to move to suspend the rules and pass it because he could not represent in doing so the report and action of a committee.

On the third Monday in January, the day on which preference was given committees, Mr. Speaker, you called from that desk the Committee on Commerce. It did not respond. Had that committee responded, the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] chairman of that committee, would have risen and as chairman made the same report he makes to-day; he would have on the part of the committee moved to suspend the rules and to pass the bill. He would have done this to get it out of the committee by representing the action of the committee and would have passed the bill. He failed to do it, and now, having lost the day of the committee in court, he seeks to remedy it by evading the rule and as an individual to get the action of his committee before the House. The Speaker knows that he reports the action of his committee. The House knows it. It is reported in the usual manner. It is looked for and accepted as the work of the committee by the House, and anybody knows that his action is the action of the committee, has its sanction and approval in order to get before the House their work appropriating $10,000,000. I go further and say that he would not have been recognized by the Speaker except as the representative of a committee. He would not have dared to ask it on so important a bill, and the Speaker under the rule would not and could not have given him as an individual preference over those who have had his promise so long.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that bill, as I understand it, is in the Committee on Commerce. It was reported to the House and it was sent back by this House. How is it to get here? It must come here as a report. The motion is to suspend the rules and pass it. If it comes at all it comes from the committee, and it comes from the chairman, the organ of the committee. It comes as it would have done on the third Monday in January when the committee had the right and when the committee under call would have responded just as it did to-day.

Mr. Speaker, what is the language under the rule? Individuals on this day shall have preference. What is the object? To prevent the report of a committee which has not been made from coming directly or indirectly before the House in preference to individual members. Can he defeat the rule by saying Judge REAGAN as an individual and not as chairman proposes to get this action before the House? He does no more and no less to-day than what Judge REAGAN would have done as chairman of the Committee on Commerce, and when he had a right to act for it—to wit, to move to suspend the rules of the House and pass the bill. If he can do that now in his capacity as an individual, your rule is a humbug. It is worse than a humbug. There is no meaning in it. It is a fraud, an insult to the intelligence of the House. I understand, Mr Speaker, that the object of the rule was to give individuals one day as their own over committees. Before the last rules were adopted, the Speaker always and properly, as I think, gave preference to committees; hence individuals were hardly ever recognized. The present rule was intended to remedy this. If the true spirit of the rule is to be set aside now, and this method is to be adopted the Speaker can do the very same thing, and recognize individuals so as to get at the action of the committee on both days just as he did before, and thus, regardless of the spirit of the rule, defeat it or not as he pleases. It will not do to say as an individual he has the right to make any motion he pleases. When committees are heard no individual can be, and has never pretended to ask it; and yet this day set apart for individuals has been taken up by committees. It is wrong, and is a fraud upon the rights of individuals and upon their constituents who have no other way of getting a hearing. I ask the Speaker, in all fairness, to decide the question regardless of consequences. I ask him to decide it according to the spirit of the rule, and not in such a way that while he sustains the letter he utterly destroys the spirit of the rule. If this point of order is overruled, then the Speaker can at his option give preference to committees on any day, and the rule which should govern us to-day is a mockery, and individuals by the action of the Speaker can be always kept from the floor—a power, in my opinion, never intended to be given to one man.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I stated at the outset, I am not raising any captious objections to this bill. I know too well, sir, that it will pass. I know that I cannot prevent it. I dare not throw myself in the way of its passage. Rules and individuals both must go down before it. If it is the will of the House to pass this bill they can pass it to-morrow without a suspension of the rules. They can pass it any day without hinderance to individual rights. They do not need to suspend the rules to-day. They can pass it without conflicting at all with the rights that I and others have to be heard on questions that affect our sections. If the rule which should govern us to-day had said that preference should be given to individuals and no report not yet made from any committee should interfere directly or indirectly with this right, the rule would be unmistakable, and yet the rule in its spirit is just as strong as it is. But I am to be ruled out and the committee or the chairman of the committee is to be heard because he says I am not the chairman of the committee. I am Judge REAGAN, and claim my right as such to bring the work of this committee to the attention of the House, and the Speaker says as chairman you cannot, as judge you can. Is that fair or just? Is that in accordance with the spirit of the rule? If so, then down with the rule. It is a humbug and a fraud which gives the entire power of the House into the hands of one man.

Mr. KENNA. Mr. Speaker, I have but one single word to say in response to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. COX. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX. Is this debate on the point of order, or is it the general debate upon the bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina makes the point of order, as the Chair understands, that the proposition to suspend the rules to-day must come from an individual member and not from the Committee on Commerce. That the proposition which the gentleman from Texas offers is one which comes from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SCALES. The Chair will remember that when the bill was being read I reserved the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not going to cut the gentleman out of his right. The Chair has merely stated the point which the gentleman from North Carolina makes, which, as the Chair understands it, is that he has no right to recognize the gentleman from Texas to-day to bring before the House this bill. That the Chair takes to be the point for the reason, as the gentleman from North Carolina alleges, that it properly belongs to the Committee on Commerce, which would have the right on the third Monday in the month to suspend the rules and not interfere with the rights of individual members to-day to move a suspension to-day.

Mr. KENNA. I desire, Mr. Speaker, as I have stated, to say only a word in response to the point of order submitted by the gentleman from North Carolina. In the first place I submit that the point of order raised by the gentleman is absolutely answered by the fact that the Commerce Committee of this House has not at any time authorized or required any member of that committee to report this bill and move to suspend the rules and pass it. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is an absolute answer to the point of order made by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. SCALES. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. KENNA. Certainly.

Mr. SCALES. Will the gentleman say to this House that it was not distinctly understood by the Committee on Commerce that the chairman of that committee should report this bill to the House to-day, with a view to having action upon it?

Mr. KENNA. When the gentleman from North Carolina will put me in the attitude of being able to understand the individual impulses of members of that committee then I will answer his question, and not before. So far as it as a committee of this House authorized the chairman or any other member to report this bill and move to suspend the rules, I say that no such action has been taken. Unless the House misunderstands me in that proposition, however, I desire to say——

Mr. CLYMER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KENNA. I am answering a question now; one at a time. It is a fact that the bill which the gentleman from Texas moves to suspend the rules and pass is the exact bill upon which the Committee on Commerce of this House has agreed after two or three long months of labor and investigation. I fail to comprehend in what manner or by what process of reasoning either the Speaker, as the organ of this House, or the House itself can fail to recognize a gentleman on this day, under the rules, simply because the bill he happens to offer is one upon which a committee of the House after investigation has agreed. That is all there is in the proposition.

Mr. CLYMER. Let me understand the proposition of the gentleman. Do I understand him to say that the chairman of the committee was not authorized to report the bill?

Mr. KENNA. If the gentleman means from his interrogatory to intimate that he understands the gentleman from Texas is acting in opposition to the wishes of the Committee on Commerce, so far as they are individually concerned I have no answer to make, for I have not consulted them. The committee as a committee have taken no action on the proposition.

Mr. CLYMER. Then there is some error, for I think by reference to the record it will be seen the gentleman from Texas explicitly declared he reported the bill from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. KENNA. So he did.

Mr. CLYMER. And the House so understood, and that he did so by authority of the committee.

Mr. KENNA. The motion of the gentleman from Texas is for a suspension of the rules and the passage of the bill which the gentleman from Texas reported to the House from the Committee on Commerce as the bill of that committee, and asked to have printed and recommitted.

Mr. CLYMER. That is what I thought the gentlemen negatived.

Mr. KENNA. But the Committee on Commerce has not instructed the gentleman from Texas on behalf of the committee to move a suspension of the rules on the day on which they have the right as a committee to exercise that privilege.

There is but one question involved and it is this: that an individual member of the House in undertaking to offer to-day a bill which has been matured by a committee of the House is encroaching upon the privileges of that committee, which upon a subsequent day may have the right to move to suspend the rules and pass the bill. I submit there is nothing in that, because that committee has not up to this time availed itself of that privilege.

Mr. FORT. The committee will have two weeks to instruct their chairman to report the bill. They will have their day and ought not to monopolize the day assigned to private individuals.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, it is right that I should state the precise status of this bill. The Committee on Commerce, after bestowing on it great labor, agreed to a bill; agreed unanimously to a bill, and authorized me to report it to the House, and to ask that it be printed and recommitted. That is where the bill stands so far as the action of this House is concerned. If we waited to take up this bill until two weeks from to-day, and the House should then pass it, we feared it would be too late for the bill to receive the sanction of the Senate. And if we had waited for two weeks the Committee on Commerce might not have been reached on the call of committees and the bill might have been passed over, and thus the labors of the committee would have been lost and the privilege of the House to act upon the bill would have been lost. In order to obviate those difficulties and those delays the committee have unanimously agreed to the bill as reported to the House. To-day, in my capacity as a member of the House, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill, which, though not now reported to the House by the committee, has the unanimous sanction of the committee. My motion is to discharge the Committee on Commerce from the further consideration of the bill, and to suspend the rules and pass it.

Now, the objection, if I understand it, urged by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] is that the bill appropriates a large amount of money, and therefore ought not to be passed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would remind the gentleman from Texas that the merits of the bill are not now before the House.

Mr. REAGAN. I am not going to discuss the merits of the bill, but I wish to reply to a remark made by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I wish to ask the gentleman from Texas a question bearing on the point of order; whether, if this had been a day for motions to suspend the rules on reports of committees, the gentleman from Texas would have felt authorized, as the case now stands, to make the motion on behalf of the Committee on Commerce to suspend the rules?

Mr. REAGAN. It is not necessary I should answer that question. It is not before the House.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to know if this bill has not been approved by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. REAGAN. I have so stated. I desire to state, not with the view of discussing the merits, but in answer to the point of order of the gentleman from North Carolina who made the point, that the bill appropriates a large amount of money, that that is not an objection under the rule. It may be an objection that may well address itself to the discretion of members in voting on the suspension of the rules, but it is not a question upon which a point of order can be made. The objection simply addresses itself to the discretion of members voting on the motion to suspend the rules.

There is only one other remark I deem it necessary to make. It is that a motion to suspend the rules is a motion to suspend all rules. I have been recognized to make that motion. It is before the House under the authority to make a motion to suspend the rules. The remedy is if it is not approved by the House to vote down the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. WEAVER. I would like to be heard a moment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. WEAVER. At the last session of this Congress a new rule was adopted for the purpose of preventing conflicts between those who represented committees and individuals desiring to move a suspension of the rules. The new rule sets apart the third Monday of the month as committee day, and the first Monday as individual day. Now I submit to the Chair that the construction sought to be given to the rule to-day practically—I care nothing about the technicalities which justify it—but practically it has the effect of giving to the committees both Mondays and to shut out individual members from moving a suspension of the rules. And I submit, if that is to be the construction, the settled construction of that rule, then we might just as well do away with the rule altogether, and say that individuals shall not be recognized at all. This is done manifestly with the purpose of avoiding resolutions by individual members. There is not a member of the House so dull as not to comprehend that such is the purpose. It is an open crucifixion of the rights of the members of this House and of the rights of our constituents.

None but gentlemen who represent committees have been recognized here to-day, and yet it is individual day. What a farce and a mockery! Will individuals be accorded the same privilege on the third Monday; not a word of it.

I have a bill which I wish to bring before this House to-day, known as a bill to equalize the pay of soldiers. I cannot do it if this construction of the rule is to obtain. Sir, that large element of our population, the very men whose blood and valor saved this nation, will be denied justice here, committees, by indirection, will be allowed to nullify the very laws which make this a deliberative body, in order to force through an ill-considered measure which appropriates $10,000,000 at one haul. I protest against that construction of the rule.

Mr. WARNER. One word on the point of order. It seems to me perfectly clear that this is an evasion of the rule, a violation of the spirit of the rule, by whatever method it is brought about. The question is whether the rule shall be set aside by an indirect method when it cannot be done directly.

Mr. McLANE. Neither of the gentlemen on this floor who have taken exceptions to this motion has stated the motion itself. The bill in regard to which a motion is made to suspend the rules is not the bill perfected by the Committee on Commerce. That bill is now in that committee and not before the House. The motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] is to discharge the Committee on Commerce from the further consideration of that particular bill, citing its number, and then to pass the bill with amendments. That is the motion now pending.

The objection taken by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] has no pertinency at all to the actual motion pending, nor has his inquiry as to whether the committee has perfected the bill. Still less is there any ground for the intimation of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WEAVER.]

Mr. SCALES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McLANE. Certainly.

Mr. SCALES. Is it not well known and well understood by every member of this House that that bill comes here with the sanction of the Committee on Commerce, and that it could come here in no other way? If it does come from that committee, if it is proposed to pass it as coming from that committee, and in no other way, I ask the gentleman if it is not an evasion of the rule by trying to do indirectly what cannot be done directly?

Mr. McLANE. It was not at all necessary for the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] to propound that question to me, because I had already replied to it in the statement which I have made to the House. I have said that the bill perfected by the committee is now before the committee and not before the House at all. It is a printed bill, a copy of which I hold in my hand, and is House bill No. 7104.

Now as to the motive of the gentleman from Texas in making the motion he has made. He has very explicitly stated, in explanation of his course, that had he waited for the instructions of his committee to ask for a suspension of the rules, he could not under the rules of this House have moved such suspension until the third Monday in February. Therefore, exercising his own individual judgment, he thought that would allow too short a time before the close of this session for the proper consideration of this bill.

Therefore, not to evade the rule, but to avail himself of the rule, a rule perfectly explicit, a rule which provides that on the first Monday of the month an individual member of this House may move to suspend the rules, availing himself of the rule, not evading it, he has made the motion now before the House; and I call the attention of the House upon this point of order particularly to the fact that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] acts in his individual capacity and has explained why he acts in that individual capacity. His explanation is that he acts in his individual capacity because if he should wait for a fortnight longer in order to act in his capacity as chairman of the Committee on Commerce and should then pursue the course which the rule authorizes him to pursue as such chairman, he would lose time which he deems indispensable for the proper consideration of this bill.

So far from justifying the intimation that he is taking the House by surprise, he assigns the motive which prompts him to this course, and which is that the Senate as well as the House should have full and ample time to consider this bill.

The only question is whether he has pursued the course pointed out to him by the rules. Has he the right as an individual member of the House to move to-day to discharge a committee from the consideration of a particular bill? I do not believe there is a man in this House who will deny that right to any member of the House. It is exactly what the rule was instituted for.

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, as the presiding officer of this House, that you have hitherto throughout this session and during last session, whenever a member of this House chose to do so, whether he were a member of the committee or not, conceded to him the right to rise and move that a committee be discharged from the further consideration of a particular bill, indicating the bill by its number, and to put it on its passage. Now the chairman of the Committee on Commerce makes that motion with the addition that the bill shall be passed with amendments, and his motion is in writing and the amendments are attached to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state to the House that when the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] made application to him for recognition to move to suspend the rules and pass this bill he stated to the Chair, which statement has since been corroborated by two other members of the Committee on Commerce, that the Committee on Commerce had nothing to do with the motion which he proposed to make and which he has since made; that he claimed the right as an individual member of this House to make that motion.

It is not given to the Chair, whatever may be his judgment as to the propriety of the passage of a bill, to allow that judgment to interfere in the least degree with the discharge of his duties as the chief officer of this House. Therefore, believing that technically according to the rule the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] was in order, the Chair did not feel at liberty to thwart the will of even a minority of this House in reference to this bill, much less to stand here and singly thwart the desire of perhaps two-thirds of the members of this House in reference to the bill.

The Chair therefore believes that in recognizing the gentleman distinctly in his individual capacity he has not gone beyond the limitations of the rule, and has left to this House its judgment as to the proper interpretation of the rule, which is the duty of every presiding officer in every legislative body.

This bill is a bill of importance—in fact a general appropriation bill. It covers interests in almost every State in this Union; and if the Chair should allow his individual wishes or motives to influence him in the construction of the rules as affecting such a question, he would hardly be worthy of the place he occupies. [Applause.]

The Chair therefore thinks that he is within the scope of the rule when he takes the word of a member of this House on a matter of this kind; for the Chair has no right to question the veracity of a member when that member rises in his place and states that he makes a motion solely on his individual responsibility as a member, and not in any way as a representative of his committee. The Chair therefore thinks that he is correct in the recognition, and he leaves the rest to the House.

Mr. SCALES. Will the Chair allow me to correct him on one point. I understood him to say that this question has been submitted to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not alluded in his remarks to any former decision. He bases his recognition solely upon the question as presented by the motion of the gentleman from Texas. [Cries of "Regular order!"] The first question is on seconding the motion to suspend the rules.

Several members called for tellers; and, in accordance with Rule XXVIII, tellers were appointed, Mr. REAGAN and Mr. COX being designated by the Chair.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 122, noes 72.

So the motion of Mr. REAGAN was seconded.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] is now recognized to control ten minutes of the time allowed for debate on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. REAGAN. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. SAMFORD.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Before the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SAMFORD] proceeds, I would like to put to the gentleman from Texas one question only. Does not this bill appropriate $2,600,000 in excess of the amount recommended by the War Department?

Mr. REAGAN. I will answer the gentleman. In considering the improvement of the Mississippi River according to the plans submitted by a board of Government engineers under the law of 1879, the committee has consented in the execution of that project to an appropriation of $1,000,000 for the improvement of the Mississippi River from its mouth to the mouth of the Ohio.

Mr. ATKINS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. REAGAN. I was answering the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] as to whether this bill did not appropriate an extra amount for the improvement of the Mississippi River.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. That was not my inquiry. The question I asked was whether this bill does not appropriate $2,600,000 in excess of the estimates of the War Department.

Mr. REAGAN. No, sir. On the contrary, the estimates of the War Department called for over twenty-six million dollars; and we cut down the appropriations to a little over ten million dollars.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Did the War Department recommend that amount on the items embraced in this bill?

Mr. REAGAN. The Department recommended that on the items embraced in this bill. There is no item in the bill that is not put there in conformity with the recommendation of the War Department—not one; and there are very few or no items (unless it may be some small items for finishing works) as to which we have allowed the amount of the estimate of the Department.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman had better let me answer the question already put, unless his question is in the same line.

Mr. ATKINS. It is in the same line.

Mr. REAGAN. Very well.

Mr. ATKINS. I wish to ask whether the appropriations in this bill for the Mississippi River are not about two million dollars, or a little over two million dollars, in excess of the amount that has usually been recommended by the Committee on Commerce for the Mississippi River?

Mr. REAGAN. Not quite so much as that. I will explain just how much. In 1879 we passed a bill creating a commission to devise and submit to Congress a plan for the permanent improvement of the Mississippi River. That commission submitted a plan which has been indorsed by the War Department. The Chief of Engineers, as well as two members of the commission, General Gilmore and General Comstock, came to us and suggested that the least amount we ought to appropriate to begin the work between the mouth of the Ohio and the mouth of the Mississippi was $1,800,000; and that amount was recommended by another committee of this House. We felt, however, that in inaugurating this great work on a river and harbor bill it would be best to limit the appropriation to as small an amount as would enable the work to be properly started. Hence we limited the appropriation for that purpose to $1,000,000. That is above the ordinary appropriation on the Mississippi River.

On that portion of the Mississippi between the mouth of the Ohio and the mouth of the Illinois we last year allowed $250,000. This year, looking to the permanent improvement of the navigation of the river, we increased that item to $600,000, being an increase of $350,000 over the former amount. This work is in conformity with the recommendation of the War Department, but the appropriation recommended by that Department was $1,100,000. We allowed about one-half.

The portion of the Mississippi between the mouth of the Illinois and the Des Moines Rapids received last year $100,000; but to keep that work up with the scale for the improvement of the river we decided to increase that item $75,000, making it $175,000.

To the portion of the river between Des Moines Rapids and Saint Paul we gave last year $150,000. This year, looking to the plan of the improvement of the navigation of that river, we increase that item by some fifty thousand dollars, that increase being less than the recommendation of the War Department.

These are the only unusual appropriations, except an appropriation of $150,000 to aid in the commencement of the system of reservoirs on the headwaters of the Mississippi River. These items all aggregate—and, as I have said, they are the only extraordinary items in the bill—the sum of $1,625,000.

But this is not all the money that is appropriated to that river. There are other items. I mean to say, Mr. Speaker, however, that these are the only unusual appropriations.

Now, then, I will state to the House that this increase of appropriations for the improvement of the navigation of that great river which are contained in this bill is two hundred and odd thousand dollars more than in the bill reported last year. It is between $400,000 and $500,000 less than the law which passed the House and Senate last year, if we leave out the items for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River and the establishment of the reservoir system.

It is right the House should know why this bill is more than $1,000,000 larger than the bill reported to the House last year. The items of appropriation, I repeat again, are all within and below the estimates of the Department, the aggregate of the estimates being more than $26,000,000, and the difficult task was imposed upon the committee of getting a bill as low as $10,000,000 out of these items.

Mr. MARSH. I see on page 15 of the bill, "For the improvement of the Mississippi River in accordance with the plan therefor adopted by the Mississippi River commission, $1,000,000." Will the gentleman inform me whether that $1,000,000 is appropriated for the purpose of filling up the gaps in the broken levees on the Lower Mississippi River or whether it is for the purpose of improving the channel and thereby the navigation of that river? I ask this question for the reason that, if it is the design to appropriate money out of the public Treasury to build up the broken-down levees of the South, then that system in equity and fairness should be extended wherever there are overflowed lands along other rivers in this country—which I do not think, however, this House is prepared to do.

Mr. REAGAN. I yielded to the gentleman for a question and not for a speech, and certainly not for any denunciation of the recommendations of the Mississippi River commission.

Now, in answer to the question which has just been proposed to me I have this to say: the Mississippi River commission pointed out certain reaches in the Mississippi River which in their judgment ought to be improved. The first is at New Madrid, forty miles long. The estimate for that was $923,000. That was recommended by this Mississippi River commission as being necessary for the improvement of New Madrid reach. The next is Plum Point reach, thirty-eight miles long, for which there was an estimate of $736,000. The next was Memphis reach, sixteen miles long, for which $382,000 was recommended. Then comes Helena reach, thirty miles long, for which $627,000 was recommended. That was for contracting the channel and protecting the banks, &c. The next is for Choctaw Bend, thirty-five miles long, for which $576,000 is estimated. Finally, we have for Lake Providence reach, twenty-five miles long, $619,000 recommended.

The plan recommended by the Mississippi River commission for the improvement of the Mississippi River is by these reaches.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's ten minutes have expired.

Mr. MARSH. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that I asked the question of the gentleman from Texas in perfect good faith. I found in the bill a clause appropriating $1,000,000 provided that it shall be expended in accordance with the plan adopted by the Mississippi River commission. Now, when I come to read the report of that commission I see they recommend an appropriation of $1,010,000 for the closing up of the gaps in the levees of the Lower Mississippi River, and the coincidence between an appropriation of $1,000,000 in this bill and the $1,010,000 proposed in the plan of the Mississippi River commission to be expended in filling up levee gaps induced me to make the inquiry I did.

Mr. SAMFORD. I rise to a question of order.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. SAMFORD. I desire to know whether I have not the floor?
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas yielded to the gentleman from Alabama for two minutes: but the gentleman from Texas then went on to speak and he has occupied eleven minutes.
Mr. SAMFORD. That eleven minutes does not come out of my two minutes. [Laughter.]
The SPEAKER. They do not; and the Chair will now recognize the gentleman from Alabama for two minutes, which will leave two minutes remaining of the fifteen minutes in favor of the bill.
Mr. SAMFORD. Mr. Speaker, this bill comes up, as usual, to be passed under a suspension of the rules, with but thirty minutes allowed for debate, and no opportunity for amendment of any sort. The three minutes allowed me, will serve only to say a word in behalf of the navigation of a river in which I am deeply interested as the representative of a large and intelligent part of my constituency.

I do not like this bill, because there ought to be a larger appropriation for the Choctawhatchee River. But I know if it fails, no other bill can be reported at this session, and hence I am forced reluctantly to support it.

There is but one other work of a governmental nature in my district—the Pea River. The engineer's report prevents an appropriation for that river at this time, very much to my regret, and hence the appropriation for the Choctawhatchee should have been far more liberal than the sum allowed, in comparison with other works. This river, nearly two hundred miles in length, waters a large section of country in two States. I will leave to the honorable gentleman from Florida to speak of the great advantage its opening to navigation will be to his State.

For years its importance as a highway for commerce has not been recognized by Congress. The interests of the citizens to be benefited by its improvement have been unjustly ignored. And when I have sought to impress upon the Committee on Commerce the advantages to accrue from its successful navigation, I have regretted to find that there was a disposition to believe that I was only striving for an appropriation for my district without reference to merit. Indeed, I have been compelled to strive, in season and out of season, to obtain the partial recognition which has been given. The committee decided to allow only $5,000, but owing to persistent appeal, the sum of seven thousand was given, not one-tenth the sum which could be used with great advantage to the commercial necessities of a large number of citizens.

Sir, the area of country to be benefited by the successful navigation of this river, in Alabama alone, embraces thousands of square miles. Magnificent forests of the finest timber in the world cover a large section of this country. Cattle and sheep husbandry thrive as well there as on the prairies of Texas or New Mexico, and is rapidly increasing. All sorts of produce, such as corn, oats, cotton, sugar-cane and the like, is being largely raised, and this river is their natural outlet. The citizens are as enlightened, intelligent, industrious, thrifty, law-abiding and worthy, as any in our common country. Owing to the lack of transportation, they are forced to haul their produce forty, fifty, and even seventy-five miles to market. They bear their just proportion of the taxes of the country, and it is not fair that they should be deprived of their just proportion of the benefits.

If I had time I could give the statistics of its commerce, which have been increased by the improvement made with the small appropriation of last year. Three steamboats have already been placed on the river, and others contemplated. The town of Geneva, at the present headwaters of navigation, has within a few months had new life infused into her commerce. I am informed by a perfectly reliable gentleman that Colonel Haines, the engineer, stated to him recently that his estimate of $20,000 was for only a small part of the river, and yet that is the estimate upon which the committee acted in giving an appropriation for the whole river. It is too late for me to correspond directly with the engineer this session, as I would have done with earlier information, else I have no doubt he would verify my statement.

While I know nothing more will be granted in this bill, I hope the agitation which has been had in reference to this matter will secure justice in the future. I do not now discuss the constitutionality or propriety of such legislation; it has grown up without any assistance of mine, and as long as it remains the practice of the General Government, it is unfair, ungenerous, and unjust to ignore the claims of a river of such importance as the Choctawhatchee.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER, Mr. ROBERTSON, Mr. THOMAS TURNER, Mr. FROST, and Mr. KITCHIN by unanimous consent were granted leave to print remarks on the river and harbor appropriation bill. [See Appendix.]

Mr. WHITE. I ask by unanimous consent that all gentlemen who desire to may have the right to print in the RECORD remarks on this bill.
The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is ordered accordingly.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, we have made some reform in the way of considering appropriation bills for rivers and harbors. We now have under our new rule a modicum of debate. It is fifteen minutes pro and fifteen minutes con, and this on a bill which aggregates $10,179,800. One-half of that time will be $5,089,900; ten minutes for $3,393,666; one minute for $339,366; for every half minute $169,000, and for every second of this debate $51,656. [Laughter.] Time is precious. Every second that ticks—ticks—out goes $51,656 for this doubtful expenditure!

That is indeed limiting debate; but why should we complain? Are not all these various propositions to spend the money of the people involved in this measure, and running up to $10,000,000 or more—forty pages of them, with thousands to the line—are they not all to be adopted or rejected in half an hour? Precious privilege! Is it not all arranged beforehand? "Of course it is," somebody behind me says; and somebody knows.

One friend of mine told me just now that he could not afford to go for this bill, because he had only $104,000 in it. [Laughter.] Another told me that he would favor it, because he had $300,000 in it, which made quite a difference in his favor. [Renewed laughter.] Several gentlemen who have large cities like New York do not intend to vote for this bill on a principle, whether there be in it Hell Gate or any other gate. [Laughter.] We know that New York is a great commercial entrepôt and center. She will always be the great seaport and metropolis of the country. Somebody will see to it without logrolling or persuasion that she will always get what she deserves from a just and generous Congress for her harbor and its approaches.

Let us glance over this bill a little. There are some features in it that arrest my attention and touch my fancy. I do not mean to repeat my former protests against similar bills. The reasons for such protests are only too familiar. The practice of passing such bills with inadequate debate, and of suspending the rules to attain the object, is vicious, even if every item of the bill were worthy of our approval. Nor will I now analyze the bill to show the small, inappropriate, and limited objects for which these Federal appropriations are made. That has been done on similar bills of less amount. The subject has been exhausted, though the logical sequence and practical results seem not to be as yet understood by the Committee on Commerce.

Look at those gentlemen on this Commerce Committee. They all had a hand in preparing the bill. See how kind they are to their own States. I do not undertake to say that these gentlemen on the committee really meant to have helped themselves so bountifully. [Laughter.] No, no; I do not say that. But somehow or other it will appear, by investigation, that more than one-half of this $10,179,000 is given to the States represented on this Committee on Commerce. A very good committee to be on for certain purposes, [great laughter,] and the gentleman from New England, who nods assent, [Mr. MORSE,] and who understands thrift, knows something about it himself. Look at my friend from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.] How much does REAGAN—[laughter]—I mean how much does Texas get in this bill? Seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars. My elegant colleague from New York [Mr. BLISS] gets $469,000. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROSS]—where is my modest friend from New Jersey?

Mr. ROSS. Here he is.

Mr. COX. My friend from New Jersey, $271,000—the little State of New Jersey. The honorable gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCLANE] is satisfied with $181,000. The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. THOMAS TURNER,] whose character I reverence, [laughter,] and who sits before me—Kentucky, that has nothing but a few local streams that one of its members said only required improvement by macadamizing. [Laughter.] How much does my friend get in this bill? Three hundred and four thousand dollars.

Mr. THOMAS TURNER. Only $168,000; that is wrong. [Great laughter.]

Mr. COX. Only $168,000. Now, the gentleman has kept his eye upon this bill evidently, and has made a close calculation; knowing just how much he was appropriating for the land, or streams, of Kentucky.

Now, in this calculation, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say, in justice to the gentleman from Kentucky, that I am not counting certain general appropriations; for instance, a reservoir in one place, $50,000; in another, $150,000 for the improvement of the Mississippi, Missouri, and Arkansas Rivers. Nor do I reckon one million for the improvement of the Mississippi River, according to certain plans adopted by the Mississippi commission; nor for gauging water, $5,000, and the Upper Mississippi, $25,000, making $1,330,000 not included in the special dispensations to these most favored States.

Nor have I been particular in making these calculations, (hurriedly made, and perhaps with some mistakes,) in fixing the precise division of cost for boundary rivers—like the Ohio—between two or more States. What I want to show is: the lavish reward a State obtains by the vigilance of its attentive Representatives on the Committee on Commerce.

But adding up for the State of Kentucky all the little items of the bill that my friend has got into it, I find that it foots up a total of $304,000. That is my calculation. It may be wrong. If it is wrong I will correct it. [Laughter.] I would never consciously do injustice to Kentucky or to my venerable friend, its active Representative. [Laughter.]

But let us pursue it further. What else does this list show? The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ACKLEN] gets $232,000. The gallant gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BEALE,] $250,000. My good friend, Mr. DEUSTER, of Wisconsin, $418,000. Missouri, so cleverly represented by the gentleman Mr. CLARDY, $620,000. The indefatigable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. O'NEILL,] $474,000. The adroit gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. WAIT,] $188,000. And here is

Illinois, an inland State, [laughter,] has a little touch of the lake here and there on its border; how much do you think, under the arrangement of its member on commerce, [Mr. HENDERSON,] she gets in this bill? Why, $912,000, nearly one-tenth of the whole sum! Where is Ohio? How much does Ohio get? Ohio, I know, is pretty well supplied with statesmen. She generally gets what she wants. She has got in this bill, thanks to her statesman, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] $401,000. Massachusetts being represented by its business member [Mr. RUSSELL] gets $249,000. So that the Committee on Commerce pile up over five millions——

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. How about West Virginia?

Mr. FROST. And how about KENNA?

Mr. COX. West Virginia? I forgot West Virginia. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORT. West Virginia has $281,000.

Mr. COX. Two hundred and seventy-one thousand dollars. Let us be just. I believe the Little or Big Kanawhas have come on here for years and years. They are always dry. They ask for more and more appropriations which they sink in their sands. They come now asking for more. They will keep on asking. To-day they have in this bill to be deposited in those same old rivers $271,000.

In the aggregate, these States represented by this honorable Committee on Commerce foot up the pretty sum of a little over one-half of ten millions of dollars, or $5,921,000. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. How about North Carolina?

Mr. COX. Oh, North Carolina is not on the committee.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. Nor in the bill.

Mr. COX. It has been suggested here, and some real discussion has been had in reference to it, whether these appropriations have exceeded the estimates or not. Now, the bill recommends a total of about ten million dollars. This is $2,689,000 in excess of the estimates of the Secretary of War.

Mr. REAGAN. The estimates of the engineers originally sent from the Department were over twenty-two million dollars; and over five million dollars were added by supplementary estimates.

Mr. COX. Wait till I get through. Those are the first estimates I was about to refer to, and, as I am informed, estimates came in afterward. But did you not exceed the estimates heretofore in other years? According to what Senator BECK said in an argument made in the Senate last year, you must have done it. He says:

After giving the list of what the engineers have said ought to be done, the whole amount of which was $14,326,650, the Secretary adds this note:

"Reduction by Secretary of War, to make this aggregate correspond with the aggregate of his estimates for rivers and harbors, as submitted December, 1878, (Estimate Book for 1878-'80, p. 138,) $9,311,650; total harbors and rivers, $5,015,000."

That is what the Secretary of the Treasury asks for; that is what he says the Secretary of War demands; and yet a professed democratic Congress presents a bill now close on to $10,000,000, double the estimates of a republican Secretary of the Treasury, of a republican Secretary of War, and seeks to put every dollar of this money into the hands of republican electioneerers to carry the next election, and there is where half the money will go. I have endeavored as far as I could to keep within the estimates. I have endeavored to keep clear of a proper charge being made that we were extravagant beyond what the heads of Departments demanded.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman from New York state how that Senator voted on that bill?

Mr. REAGAN. Let me say——

Mr. COX. I do not yield. I believe the Senator voted for the bill; a curious illustration of how men sometimes will act when they forget themselves. [Laughter.]

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. I want it to be understood that I voted against that bill.

Mr. COX. Well, Mr. Speaker, I would like to see and aid some way of improving certain large harbors and certain large rivers upon a proper principle. I am not opposed to having these gentlemen on the Commerce Committee now and then help themselves, provided they are just to the rest of the country. I do not say that any of the committee meant to help themselves or their constituents at the expense of the whole country. Oh, no! Still I am reminded somehow of the management of the Elder Weller, as related by his son Sam. It was election time. The father was engaged to bring down voters from London. An agent made the politic approach, as Dickens relates it, in this fashion:

"It's a wery bad road between this and London," says the gen'l'm'n. "Here and there it is a heavy road," says my father. "'Specially near the canal, I think," says the gen'l'm'n. "Nasty bit, that 'ere," says my father. "Well, Mr. Weller," says the gen'l'm'n, "you're a very good whip, an' can do what you like with your horses, we know. We're all wery fond o' you, Mr. Weller, so in case you should have an accident when you're a-bringing these here woters down, and should tip 'em over into the canal without hurtin' of 'em"—

The philosophy and application of which is summed up by Sam Weller in the following:

"But what I look at is the hextraordinary and wonderful coincidence, that arter what that gen'l'm'n said my father's coach should be upset in that wery place, and on that wery day!"

Every one of these members of the committee gets his big appropriation, which is an extraordinary and wonderful coincidence; while the rest is distributed all over the country.

But, sir, does not the whole country pay for it all?

I saw the other day that in Arizona, where there is a good deal of dry land and little water, that its governor wanted to know why it was that the American Congress while helping other States to waterways did not appropriate money to give more water to their thirsty soil. Why not? Why not let them irrigate from the Treasury? Why not, since they help to pay for these large appropriations?

Are they distributed equally in their benefits to agriculture or transportation? It is just as bad as your protective tariff system, as you know, Mr. Speaker, [laughter;] for the burden it lays is not borne equally by classes, sections, or individuals; nor is the benefit divided fairly. Why do not you distribute the tariff benefaction fairly all around? You add to the price of articles by the price of the customs dues, as you do also by the cost of transportation. And when the people of the great valleys and prairies of the farming portions of the country pay these $10,000,000, who gets the benefit? Certainly they do not get a quid pro quo. It is not distributed equally. It should go for Federal commerce, for national objects, if you please; for the important harbors and rivers, not for little streams and bayous here and there, where the people or the States should help themselves for all the local purposes that are necessary.

From the Forty-first to the Forty-fifth Congresses, inclusive, the total of annual river and harbor appropriations has been $54,962,217. Adding to this sum, for the Forty-sixth Congress, $18,000,000 more, and you have nearly seventy-three millions. Are not these millions benefits to certain localities, and not shared by all, except as they share the burdens?

I greatly desired, Mr. Speaker, to have this bill considered in the Committee of the Whole, or somewhere, for amendment. I might then have proposed an amendment: first, that the rivers appropriated for should be declared as broad as they were long; and, secondly, that the improvements in our water-ways should be made according to the methods proposed in Senate Document No. 39 of this Congress.

I hold in my hand this curious document. I ask gentlemen to read at their leisure. It comes from old Virginia. It seems that old Virginia, forgetting her early teaching, is in this business of enlarging the sphere of Federel usefulness by extensive and abnormal appropriations. Why, sir, have we forgotten everything of the old democratic ideas and traditions about appropriations for general purposes only? I had begun to fear that we had forgotten those doctrines here to-day while voting for dignifying a Bureau of Agriculture. What next? We have already a Bureau of Education, a Bureau of Health recently made, and bureaus for various other purposes were suggested. The democratic rule of strict construction and limited powers is, I fear, almost as dead as the dodo.

A MEMBER. It is deader.

Mr. MCLANE. I wish to ask the gentleman what old democrat ever voted against the river and harbor bill?

Mr. COX. River and harbor bills have been vetoed by democratic Presidents.

Mr. HAZELTON. It was done by Franklin Pierce.

Mr. COX. You will find that the late Senator Houston, of Alabama, and men of his stamp, in better days, opposed all the appropriations for other than general improvements, even in his own State, and even for the improvement of the Mussel Shoals of the Tennessee River, because the improvement was not general, but limited to a few States. He stood frankly and boldly on the principle of equality of tax and benefit, and the people sent him back here on this very issue as a tribute to his courageous honesty.

Mr. ATKINS. General Jackson voted for these bills when he was in the Senate.

Mr. MCLANE. I will name two democratic Presidents on that side for every one who can be named on the other side.

Mr. COX. I have not yielded to my democratic friend on the Committee on Commerce, the gentleman from Maryland. Every time you protest against such river and harbor bills as this you find that the member who leaps into the air and strikes the escutcheon of his State is on the Commerce Committee. [Great laughter.]

Now I wish to present a cheaper mode of improving our streams, which is proposed by a citizen of the State of Virginia, in the pamphlet to which I referred. It is a "Memorial of Daniel Ruggles, asking an appropriation to be expended in developing his system of producing rain-fall. February 12, 1880, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and ordered to be printed." [Here the hammer fell.] May I have the privilege of printing this? [Cries of "Go on!"]

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York have his time extended five minutes.

Mr. KENNA. And let the same time be given to the other side.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the time of the gentleman from New York will be extended for five minutes, and the same extension of time will be allowed on the other side. The gentleman from Texas will then have seven minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Five minutes more is a good deal of extra time to get on a bill of this size. I will use it on the "rain-fall" question and its application to our streams.

I would remark, however, that perhaps something might be gained by referring this bill to the board of education; for if we were to study geography all the year round, we might not, without its Federal help, be able to vote intelligently on these remarkable bills, involving some forty pages of strange names and localities; and then, sir, after the board of education is through with it, we might refer the board of education to the board of health, because the former would be sure to get sick of it before they got through. [Laughter.]

This gentleman, Mr. Ruggles, informs us in his pamplet that he has invented a method for condensing clouds in the atmospheric realm, and for precipitating rain-fall from rain-clouds, to prevent drought, to stimulate and sustain vegetation, to equalize rain-fall and water-flow—and by combining the available scientific inventions of the age to guard against "pestilence and famine," and to prevent or to alleviate them when prevailing.

Water-flow, Mr. Speaker, remember that!—

His plan involves theological as well as meteorological and scientific problems. He holds that it is an advance step in engineering, founded upon the Mosaic record. He says that one of the first great evolutions of the Omnipotent mind had reference to those atmospheric laws which involved drought and controlled rain-fall. Let me quote:

From the same divine source we derive an early lesson in philosophy, that "the Lord God had not caused it to rain upon the earth, and there was not a man to till the ground." (Gen. ii, 5.)

"But there went up a mist from the earth, and watered the whole face of the ground." (Gen. ii, 6.)

"And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul." (Gen. ii, 7.)

"So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them." (Gen. i, 27.)

"And God blessed them, and God said unto them, be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it: and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth." (Gen. i, 28.)

Thus we behold our sphere, in its grand celestial orbit, as it fell from the hand of Creative Wisdom.

History, both sacred and profane, admonishes us that the vicissitudes attendant upon drought menace almost continuously vast regions of the habitable globe. History, as well as observation, also admonishes us that man is neither aerial nor amphibious, but a land animal; that he walks the earth, breathes the air, drinks the waters, and that by his impulsive genius and indomitable energy he has attained dominion, more or less imperfect, over large areas of the earth's surface; a limited control over the sea, and some familiarity with, but a far more limited control over, the atmospheric realm. Even the divine injunction to man to "replenish the earth and subdue it" would seem to have been prophetic only of the progress of the ages.

History, both sacred and profane, illustrates by what slow degrees man has advanced in the subjugation of the earth, dominion over the sea, and in the conquest of the atmospheric realm. Each advancing step has constituted an era in human progress. Like the blind man in a dream it has taken a step in advance and then faltered. In his infancy the savage imitates the fish in swimming and disports himself upon the waters. The development of this faculty constitutes, however, only the first step in man's advancement. It facilitated his migration among the fishing-streams and hunting-grounds of the primeval wilderness, but he was still a savage! He invented the canoe, which constitutes an admirable triumph of human art.

The genius of man has been brilliantly illustrated in the progressive stages of development of this primeval invention in all its varied forms. In the small canoe, cut from the trunk of a forest tree or fashioned from the strong bark of the birchen tree, we trace the origin of this inspiration of savage genius. Such was the magic bark, bearing in prehistoric ages the solitary hunter and fisherman. In the progress of time each structure of canoe acquired a capacity to bear scores of savage warriors on the war-path against hostile nations.

It will thus be seen how gradually this scientific intellect produces from these sacred and profound observations his plan for the replenishing of the streams which niggard nature has left here and there waterless. Observe, too, how he pictures the savage genius and his birch-bark canoe in his avocations and migrations, when no Federal exchequer was near by to add to its largess for the genius of his invention. To what is all this tending? Nothing less than to the art of navigation, the conquest of the waters, as well as the mastery of the air, and the mastery of the waters by the mastery of the air. Sublime idea! Thus he would stir to its "profoundest depths" the immobility of the commerce of the world, whether upon the placid Hudson, the beautiful Ohio, or the magnificent Mississippi.

Now, what does he propose to do? How does he propose to do it? He proposes a cheaper mode than we are pursuing by such ten-million annual bills as these. He proposes that we shall have certain skeleton balloons sent up into the air and that these balloons shall be loaded with explosives of all kinds, with dynamite, with Vulcan powder, with mica powder, with nitro-glycerine, with Hercules powder Nos. 1 and 2, and all kinds of gun-cotton and rend-rock, all of which are to be carried up among the rain-clouds and there touched off by some bold and dashing navigator of the air. [Great laughter.] Conquering first the atmospheric realm for great industrial and commercial benefits, he would utilize the highly elastic fluid of the aerial for the navigation of an inelastic liquid. His grand idea for this object is the balloon. With this he would invade the cloud-realm. To use his own expressive language—

It is contemplated in the prosecution of my invention to combine the scientific revelation of the age in which we live (so far as may prove available) to control the cloud-realm by claiming and exacting a passing tribute, under favoring conditions, to sustain and stimulate vegetation, to prevent pervading and desolating drought, and to extract from the soil its natural increase. This result, even imperfectly attained, would tend materially to alleviate famine and often to prevent its occurrence, and would thus become a boon to mankind.

May I add that if it be that such results are attained by the precipitation of rain-fall upon the parched earth, why are such appropriations as these any longer needed? This inventor may not have exactly intended it, but by his plan he would have some of these balloons stationed in the air and over at the heads of these little streams in the mountains, far aloof from men and commerce, to pour down rain from heaven that there might be navigation, through the abundant waters which this scientific plan would produce. [Laughter.]

Let me not do injustice to this rare invention. I must needs quote again:

In the prosecution of my plan only small skeleton balloons of economical or cheap structure will be required, and—

1. The small, light, skeleton balloon to carry into the cloud realm from one to fifty pounds of dynamite, or other explosives, in torpedoes or cartridges charged with them in carefully regulated proportions, and prepared for detonation and simultaneous explosion by the time-fuse, securely attached to the framework of the balloon.

This class of balloons, charged with hydrogen-gas—from 100 to 1,000 cubic feet—would ascend in ten to twenty minutes 10,000 to 12,000 feet, with from 10 to 100 pounds of explosives, into the midst of floating rain-clouds, ready for explosion by the time-fuse.

The same class of balloons may be arranged for explosion by mechanical or clock-work arrangement.

2. The balloon of any desired capacity, bearing torpedoes and cartridges prepared for simultaneous explosion by a combination of a trailing-drag with magneto-electric force in the cloud realm.

3. The balloon, directed by an aeronaut engaged in exploration, from which torpedoes may be thrown in parachutes and exploded from the balloon or from the ground, as circumstances may render expedient.

After describing the various kinds of clouds upon which he would operate, and the results from the reciprocal action of the magneto-electric force between the earth and the clouds, and drawing the very thunders from their caverns and the lightnings from their towers, he boldly proposes his shock to the American Senate:

As a combination of mechanical and chemical forces for the inauguration of a practical plan of exploration, with a view to appropriate the atmospheric laws of cloud-land, in sunshine and in storm, and direct them, so far as may be practicable, within the sphere of the great industrial interests and energies of man, and especially so to sustain vegetation and to equalize the water-flow of streams and rivers in harmony with systems for extensive irrigation as well as to facilitate navigation.

The field is broad—very broad; as deep as it is broad—it is very deep! But when we contemplate the triumphs of American genius within the present century, there is abundant reason to anticipate untold advancement. The theory involves the whole round of philosophic principles, as well as an unlimited field for observation.

Now this system is not altogether a new system. Professor Espy has given a hint of it before. I would like to print further the various plans which are referred to by this inventor from Virginia. It is not often that Virginia gives us an inventor. When he comes here, let us hail him! He is from Fredericksburgh, Virginia, and I think he is a brave soldier, from the way he writes. He says that for adventurous science there is a more entrancing prospect in cloud-land than at the pole. He holds that there is a magnetic force like gravitation, which at certain heights does not exhibit any sensible variation; that men have gone up miles high, away up in the air, and have been all over surcharged with electricity, and that they have come down safely; and that if this be so, why could they not with dynamite explosion pour out of the clouds their water to fructify the earth and make its streams run with abundance and gladness! [Great laughter.]

Let us remember that by this explosive force there is an instantaneous conversion of solid or liquid matter in small dimensions into gas or vapor of a greatly increased volume, expanded by heat evolved, generating force, so that the explosive effect of gunpowder being taken as a unit, or 1.00, gun-cotton is 3.00, and nitro-glycerine is 4.80, and their explosive force is 1.00, 3.06, and 4.55, respectively. The most violent explosives are more limited in their effects, yet are often preferred when detonated. The potential energy of explosives, as well as coal, has been measured, approximately, by the evolution of the force, per pound, to raise one ton to the height of one foot, and is designated "per pound" so many "foot tons." The potential energy of gunpowder is 480, of gun-cotton 716, of nitro-glycerine 1,139, while that of one pound of coals is about 4,980!

If these are indeed verities, and I am not disputing them, why may not this potential energy save us from these annual appropriations? All that he asked for this wonderful invention was $10,000! It is economy. Consider its sublime object:

The conformation of our continent, crowned with its lofty mountain ranges, its great bounding rivers, its broad fertile plains, and its boundless forests—all swept by the rain clouds of surrounding oceans—all, all give assurance that a combination of skill and industry will materially protect our soil from impending droughts and from those visitations of desolating famine so often chronicled in the eastern world.

By thus scanning the vicissitudes ever impending we discover the magnitude of the contingencies we may be doomed to meet; and in the event of success in this plan for precipitation of rain-fall we also disclose the notable fact that no other scheme of philanthropy known to man—save that embodied in the Christian dispensation—transcends it.

Now, why not adopt this grand philanthropic arrangement instead of coming here year after year to get appropriations for these little creeks and insignificant rivers in the remote districts of our beloved land, to the torture of our tender consciences, to the ruin of all genuine appropriations and constitutional theories for grand Federal and national purposes? I thank the House for its attention. [Great applause.]

Mr. REAGAN. How much time have I, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has seven minutes' time, including the five minutes' extension granted by the House.

Mr. REAGAN. If there was no other advantage accruing to the country from the reporting of a river and harbor bill, we are in some measure rewarded, perhaps, for the labors of its preparation by the speeches to which we are annually treated by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.] [Laughter.]

The first point of objection which the gentleman makes to the bill now before the House is that the appropriations exceed the estimates of the War Department. I had stated to the House that the estimates before us embrace about twenty-six million dollars, while the bill appropriates about ten million dollars. The appropriations in this bill are a little less than 40 per cent. of the estimates.

In one sense the statement of the gentleman may have something in it, but he did not seem to understand the point in which there was any force in it. The Secretary of War recommended the cutting down of the estimates first sent in, from $22,000,000 to $7,500,000; but he subsequently sent in some five million dollars additional. So much for that.

The gentleman made the point that the members of the Committee on Commerce had taken special care of themselves in this appropriation bill. It will be remembered that there are fifteen members of that committee, a member from each of fifteen different States; and those States happen to be generally States where it is necessary to expend the largest amount of money in the improvement of navigation.

Now, it may be the misfortune of Massachusetts that Boston Harbor is in that State, and that she has a number of other important ports which accommodate a large commerce. It may be the misfortune of New York that Long Island Sound and the Hudson River are there. It may, in the view of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] be a crime on the part of New York that that great State has an immense commerce to be provided for.

It may be the misfortune of Pennsylvania that her great city of Philadelphia, accommodating the commerce of that State and a large portion of the commerce of the great West, is located on the Delaware River, and that there are about a hundred miles of that river which must have its navigation improved and preserved. It may be the misfortune of Maryland that the city of Baltimore is situated in that State, and that the city of Baltimore is at the head of a great estuary leading from the sea, and requires a considerable amount of money to enable it to accommodate its commerce.

It may be the misfortune of the State of Virginia that she has the Chesapeake Bay and the James River and other rivers for the transportation of her large commerce and much of the commerce of the Western and Southwestern States. It may be the misfortune of Ohio that with her immense wealth she has the great lakes on the one side and the Ohio River on the other, with the Mississippi River but little to the west, and that she is called upon to accommodate a vast commerce with great lines of water communication.

The same remarks may be made with reference to Illinois, which also has a member upon the Committee on Commerce. The gentleman from New York did not allude to the State of Michigan, for which considerable appropriations are made in this bill, and which has no member upon the committee. That State has large appropriations because of her immense water front and the commerce accommodated by her ports and the waterways of that State.

Reference was also made to the State of Wisconsin, with its large lake front and its extensive connections with the Mississippi River and with Green Bay. An objection is made also to the expenditures on the Mississippi River which runs along the borders of Iowa, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Illinois, Missouri, Kentucky, Tennessee, Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana, a great river which bears upon its besom, with its tributaries, many times the amount of our foreign commerce; a great river which furnishes transportation for the accommodation of an increasing commerce.

Mr. ACKLEN. I ask consent that the gentleman be allowed five minutes longer.

Several members objected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has given the gentleman from Texas additional time corresponding with that allowed to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KING. Before the gentleman from Texas takes his seat I should be glad to ask him a question. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The time allowed for debate on the pending motion is at an end. The question will now be taken on the motion of the gentleman from Texas, that the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the bill read at the desk, and that it be passed with the amendments read.

Mr. VALENTINE and Mr. NICHOLLS called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 160, nays 86, not voting 46; as follows:

YEAS—160.

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the motion of Mr. REAGAN to suspend the rules was not agreed to.

Before the announcement of the result,

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I beg to state that my colleague, Mr. BLOUNT, before the roll was called, left the House unwell.

Mr. KENNA. I move that the House adjourn.

Several MEMBERS. Announce the result!

The SPEAKER. The pairs will be announced.

Mr. KENNA. I insist on my motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. If this question should go over pending the announcement of the vote the result could not be changed, as under the rules it must go over until the first Monday in March, when this Congress will have expired.

Mr. KENNA. I am not discussing the effect of the motion.

The following pairs were announced:

Mr. MORTON with Mr. NICHOLLS, on this bill. If Mr. MORTON were present, Mr. NICHOLLS would vote against the bill.

Mr. ARMFIELD with Mr. MANNING, on this bill.

Mr. HISCOCK with Mr. BLOUNT, both gentlemen being engaged upon business of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MCKENZIE with Mr. CARLISLE.

Mr. BELFORD with Mr. WARNER.

Mr. STEVENSON with Mr. MITCHELL, on this vote.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH with Mr. CALDWELL, on this bill.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That Mr. HAMLIN, of Maine, and Mr. THURMAN, of Ohio, be appointed tellers on the part of the Senate in pursuance of the concurrent resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives respecting the counting the votes of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. No. 4411) to establish an additional land district in the State of Kansas.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 142) relative to repairing Wyandot mission church, Upper Sandusky, Ohio.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COOK. I move to suspend the rules, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I thought the Speaker went from side to side.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not charged the river and harbor appropriation bill to either side.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. It was an individual motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. Very well, then, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Colorado, [Mr. BELFORD.]

Mr. HAZELTON. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] is detained from the House by the death of his father. It is necessary this announcement should be made so it may appear of record to explain his absence on the votes which have been taken during the day.

BUSINESS BY UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

Mr. BELFORD. I move to suspend the rules and pass the following resolution:

Resolved, On and after Monday, February 16, and after the morning hour, one hour of each day shall be assigned to the consideration and passage of bills by unanimous consent, and the Speaker shall recognize members in the order in which their names stand on the roll.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman had better indicate this hour shall commence after the morning hour.

Mr. PRICE. There is no Monday, the 16th.

Mr. BELFORD. I will say Monday, the 14th.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that two-thirds have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. REAGAN. I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 138.

Mr. HUNTON. I wish to announce, Mr. Speaker, that Monday, February 14, has been dedicated to the business of the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman then had better make it Tuesday, the 15th.

Mr. O'NEILL. There is a mistake again; it should be Monday, the 14th instead of the 16th.

Mr. BELFORD. The resolution is not written the 16th. I will amend it as suggested, so as to read from and after Tuesday, the 15th.

Mr. ATKINS. Does this provide for one hour every day?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. ATKINS. One hour for unanimous consent every day?

The SPEAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUNTON. The resolution should read from and after Tuesday.

Mr. MILLS. Not to interfere with appropriation bills.

Mr. VALENTINE. Does that allow Delegates to come in?

The SPEAKER. They ought to be included.

Mr. CANNON, of Utah. I hope that will be done.

Mr. BELFORD. I will accept that as a modification of my resolution.

Mr. ATKINS. Subject to appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks that the Delegates from the Territories be included.

Mr. BELFORD. I accept that modification.

The SPEAKER. The negative vote will now be counted.

Mr. McMILLIN. I make the point of order that since the affirmative vote was counted the resolution has been amended in a material point, changing its character.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will take the vote over again.

Mr. ATKINS. I move the House do now adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 57, noes 180.

Mr. WARNER demanded tellers.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 28.

The SPEAKER. Not a sufficient number to order tellers.

Mr. ATKINS. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I appeal to my colleague——

Mr. ATKINS. There is no use to appeal to me.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Perhaps if you heard me for a moment you would withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ATKINS. This proposition will necessitate an extra session.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 31, noes 131.

The SPEAKER. Not a sufficient number has voted to order the yeas and nays.

Mr. REAGAN. I demand tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered, 30 voting in favor thereof; and the Speaker appointed Mr. ATKINS and Mr. BELFORD.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 30, noes 140.

So the yeas and nays were refused.

The SPEAKER. The vote was 57 ayes and 180 noes; so the House has refused to adjourn. The question now recurs on seconding the motion to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution.

Mr. McMILLIN. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McMILLIN. This is the day under the rules for the discharge of committees and passage of bills which have heretofore been introduced, and for resolutions. I make the point of order under the rules a member cannot introduce a resolution on this day.

The SPEAKER. This is a motion to suspend the rules to enable gentlemen to do so.

Mr. McMILLIN. That is true, and when you suspend the rules you are still working under a part of the rules of this House, and by that rule under which we do work a resolution, I think, cannot be introduced at this time.

The SPEAKER. A motion to suspend the rules is authorized by one of the rules, and this is a motion to suspend all rules which come into conflict with a vote of two-thirds of the House in adopting this proposition. As the resolution has been modified it will again be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on and after Tuesday, February 15, and after the morning hour, one hour each day shall be assigned to the consideration and passage of bills by unanimous consent, and the Speaker shall recognize Members and Delegates in the order in which their names stand on the roll.

Mr. ATKINS. What roll?

The SPEAKER. The roll of the House.

Mr. CONVERSE. I rise to a point of order, and it is this: this resolution changes the rules of the House, and those rules now prescribe what shall be done after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. This is a motion to suspend the rules in the manner prescribed by those rules themselves.

Mr. CONVERSE. The rule says the rules shall not be suspended without one day's notice.

The SPEAKER. This is a proposition to suspend that rule as well as the others.

Mr. WHITE. I would like to know if this can be amended. [Cries of "Regular order!"] I ask if this can be amended so as to allow the names to be alternately called from each end of the alphabet?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks that the proposition be modified so as to take the letters first beginning with A and in the same manner from the other end of the alphabet alternately, until all are called.

Mr. CONGER. I object. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. LOUNSBERY. I ask for a second to the motion.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. AINSLIE. I would like to ask the Speaker if the names of the Delegates are on the roll of the House at all?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the resolution has been so modified as to include the names of the Delegates.

Mr. AINSLIE. But the Delegates' names are not upon the roll of the House.

The SPEAKER. They are upon the roll of the House, although not upon the rolls of members as called to vote.

Mr. WHITE. Can I move to amend that proposition?

Mr. WARNER. I desire to know also if it can be modified or amended?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I rise to a point of order. There has been no second to the demand for the previous question.

Mr. WHITE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was unable to learn what point the gentleman from Illinois desired to make.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. My point was that there has been no second to the demand for the previous question. I demand a second.

Mr. SCALES. There was no demand for a second before the House divided.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman states that he rose for the purpose of demanding a second, the Chair will recognize him, and holds that it is not too late.

Mr. ACKLEN. He does not state that.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman state that he rose in time to demand a second?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I do not state that.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. I will state that I demanded a second before tellers were ordered.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. There has been no second demanded.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. I have just stated that I demanded a second, but the Chair did not recognize it before the vote was taken.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the demand of the gentleman now, and appoint tellers.

Mr. LOUNSBERY and Mr. BELFORD were appointed tellers.

The House divided; and there were ayes 104, noes 1.

Mr. MILLS. No quorum has voted.

Mr. SPARKS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is in some doubt. The rule states that pending a motion to suspend the rules one motion may be made to adjourn. That motion has already been made.

Mr. MILLS. But the rule expressly provides that in the event of no quorum being present the House must either adjourn or order a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, under that clause of the rule, entertains the motion. If the House chooses it can resist the motion.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 66, noes 93.

Mr. WARNER demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. SPARKS and Mr. BELFORD were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and there were—ayes 51, noes 88.

Mr. MILLS. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. I demand tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were refused.

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the announcement of the vote. The House refuses to adjourn.

Mr. MILLS. The question now recurs on seconding the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The tellers will resume their places. The last vote disclosed the fact that a quorum is present.

The tellers resumed their places.

The House again divided; and there were—ayes 118, noes 2.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. No quorum.

Mr. ANDERSON. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. WARNER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. FINLEY. I make the point of order that that motion is not in order pending the motion for a call of the House.

Mr. ANDERSON. I had made the motion for a call of the House before the motion to adjourn was put.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain the motion.

The call of the House was ordered.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a suggestion to the House by unanimous consent.

Mr. FROST. I object.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri object to allowing the gentleman from Maine to make a brief statement?

Mr. FROST. I will withdraw the objection.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Speaker, the proposition which has been made touching an hour to be appropriated each day it seems to me is somewhat crude, and in this: it allows one objection to prevent the consideration of a bill. Now, under the old rules, on Friday—objection day—when a bill was reached on the Private Calendar one objection was sufficient to prevent its passage; but when that bill was called again on a succeeding objection day five objections were required to prevent its being laid aside to be reported to the House. If five gentlemen rise in their seats and deliberately object to the consideration of a bill it may be well understood that there is reasonable ground for the objection. If the objection of one man can be allowed to defeat the consideration of a proposition by simply rising and objecting, we are, it seems to me, putting ourselves in the power of a single individual to prevent the House from acting upon any measure. My suggestion therefore is, that inasmuch as this proposition or a kindred one has been submitted to the Committee on Rules, and the committee has a session, I understand from the Speaker, to-morrow morning, and will consider the question and report deliberately to the House touching it, I suggest that it is better for the House to await that report than to spend the night here in this filibustering, out of which nothing of importance can grow. I therefore make the suggestion that we await the report of the Committee on Rules to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Rules, the Chair desires to state, have had under consideration at one meeting this very subject, on the resolution referred on motion of the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. ANDERSON,] and delayed coming to a conclusion in order to get an expression of opinion from the members of the House as to the form of resolution the Committee on Rules would recommend. There is, the Chair thinks, a majority of the Committee on Rules in favor of reporting something of this sort, so as to relieve the Calendar.

Mr. CALKINS. How would that come up for action? As a privileged question?

The SPEAKER. It would come from the Committee on Rules, whose right to report has never been interfered with. The Chair was anxious to recognize the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] on this subject for the very reason that the Committee on Rules wanted some expression on the part of the members of the House.

Mr. ANDERSON. In view of the fact that I understand the Committee on Rules will report——

Mr. VALENTINE. When?

Mr. ANDERSON. To-morrow or next day, I will withdraw my motion for a call of the House.

Mr. WARNER. Now I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to ask leave of the House to refer this resolution to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is ordered accordingly.

RELIEF OF JEANNETTE EXPEDITION.

Pending the motion to adjourn,

Mr. WHITTHORNE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 7156) appropriating money to be used under the direction of the Navy Department to prosecute a search for the steamer Jeannette, of the arctic exploring expedition; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. VALENTINE. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] yields to me that I may make a motion. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion to adjourn.

The question being taken, the motion to adjourn was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 8, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

Mr. BOOTH. I wish to call attention to that part of the Journal which says that the regular order, on my motion, was laid aside in order to proceed to the consideration of the pension appropriation bill. The proceeding was that it was laid aside unanimously and informally; so that it maintains its place. If there is no difference in the legal interpretation, of course I do not want a change made in the Journal; but the fact was that, by unanimous consent, the pending order was laid aside informally.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Understandings of that kind are not made part of the Journal.

The Journal was approved.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. It is.

Mr. ALLISON. If so, I ask that the memorial be referred to that committee.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. The bill was placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. BRUCE. The Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 92) to provide for the enforcement of the eight-hour law, have instructed me to report it adversely. I desire to say that I do not concur with the conclusion of the majority of the committee.

The joint resolution was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WHYTE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 2083) amending sections 1418, 1419, and 1420 of the Revised Statutes, reported it with an amendment.

CHILDREN OF JAMES M'KNATT.

Mr. BAYARD. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1987) for the relief of John H. Schabinger, guardian of Susan McKnatt and Martha McKnatt, minor daughters of James McKnatt, deceased, to report it favorably and without amendment. I desire to ask for that bill its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill directs the agent for paying pensions at Washington to issue a duplicate check, and the Treasurer, assistant treasurer, or designated depositary of the United States upon whom the same may be drawn to pay such duplicate check, for the sum of $1,001, in favor of John H. Schabinger, guardian for Susan McKnatt and Martha McKnatt, minor daughters of James McKnatt, deceased, late a private in Company B of the Fourth Regiment of Delaware Volunteers, war of 1861, in the same manner and upon the same terms and conditions as provided in section 3646 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in case of lost checks not exceeding in amount the sum of $1,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the Senator from Delaware state, so that it will go into the RECORD, as there is no written report, what are the circumstances of this case.

Mr. BAYARD. By existing law, where a check to the amount of a thousand dollars is lost in the mail, the Department may issue a duplicate upon certain sureties being taken, with bond and the like provided for by the section of the Revised Statutes referred to in the bill, where the amount does not exceed $1,000. In this case the amount was $1,001, and the original having been issued the law forbade them to issue a duplicate. It was the excess of a single dollar that prevented the Department from issuing a duplicate and taking bond in the form prescribed by law, which is required by the present bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What has become of the old check? I think every Senator understands what the law is but what I should like to know, as there is no report, is what became of the check that was issued. What is the evidence of its loss?

Mr. BAYARD. It was lost in the mail. This is the provision of section 3646 of the Revised Statutes:

> Whenever any original check is lost, stolen, or destroyed, disbursing officers and agents of the United States are authorized, after the expiration of six months, and within three years from the date of such check, to issue a duplicate check; and the Treasurer, assistant treasurers, and designated depositaries of the United States are directed to pay such duplicate checks, upon notice and proof of the loss of the original checks, under such regulations in regard to their issue and payment, and upon the execution of such bonds, with sureties, to indemnify the United States, as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe. This section shall not apply to any check exceeding in amount the sum of $1,000.

As the check which was lost unfortunately was for a thousand and one dollars the Department could not issue a duplicate, which of course must be a counterpart, without the authority of Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How long ago was it lost?

Mr. BAYARD. I think the date was about a year and a half ago.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SCHOONER A. SCOTT BROWN.

Mr. RANSOM. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1823) granting an American register to the schooner A. Scott Brown, to report it without amendment and with the recommendation that it pass, and I file with the papers a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury recommending its passage. I call the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania on my left [Mr. WALLACE] to the fact.

Mr. WALLACE. I ask unanimous consent to take up and pass the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to ask consent to take up and consider a bill that was reported on the 26th of January.

Mr. WALLACE. If the Senator objects, I withdraw my request.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not object. I only want to find out what are the principles of fair play on which we are to proceed. If it is the bad luck of a little relief bill for a poor widow to have been reported some days ago instead of being reported to-day, I want to ask my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] who reported it to ask to have it recommitted so that he can report it again. I do not object this morning. I only put in an appeal for those who have been so unlucky as to have had their reports made earlier.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read and objections reserved.

The Chief Clerk read the bill (S. No. 1823) to grant an American register to the schooner A. Scott Brown; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What are the facts about it?

Mr. WALLACE. Let the letter from the Department be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 7, 1881.

SIR: A bill (S. No. 1823) has been brought to my notice authorizing the issue of a register to the schooner Wacousta, under the name of A. Scott Brown, built in Canada, and now owned, as is alleged, by an American citizen.

This is one of the barges that were purchased by American citizens in the expectation of being employed under the act of June 30, 1879. A decision of the Attorney-General compelled the levying of an alien tonnage tax on this class of barges, and thus defeated the operation of the act in their benefit.

Under the circumstances I think this vessel should be admitted to registry.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN,
Secretary Treasury.

Hon. WILLIAM A. WALLACE, United States Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT TO DISTRICT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (S. No. 2094) for the relief of George W. Flood, the bill referred to by the Senator from Vermont. It will not take a moment to have it passed.

Mr. HARRIS. I rise to morning business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair must first receive morning business.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 7035) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF FISH COMMISSIONER.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 372) authorizing the Public Printer to print reports of the United States Fish Commissioner upon new discoveries in regard to fish-culture, to report it without amendment and recommend its passage, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CONKLING asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2162) correcting the pension granted to Lieutenant George W. Graham, One hundred and forty-fourth Regiment New York Volunteers, in accordance with his rank; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BROWN asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2163) for the relief of W. A. Reid; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WHYTE. Some time ago I introduced a joint resolution which upon inspection I find was either inaccurately printed or inaccurately copied. Therefore I wish to introduce a correct one of the same character, and ask its reference to the Committee on Claims.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 154) providing for the ascertainment and payment of the claim of the legal representatives of Walter H. Stevens, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

SOLDIERS' REUNION AT LINCOLN, NEBRASKA.

Mr. SAUNDERS asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 152) granting the use of artillery, tents, &c., to be used at the soldiers' reunion to be held at Lincoln, Nebraska, in the month of September, 1881; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I ask for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read at length, and objections reserved.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska whether we did not pass an act upon that subject at the last session?

Mr. SAUNDERS. That was for the last year, and there is another reunion for this year, to be held next September.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I would suggest whether it would not be well to make a standing law for Nebraska in order to avoid this special legislation.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I would have no objection to that.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROHIBITION OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

Mr. BLAIR asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 153) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read the first timeby its title.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask that that joint resolution be read at length.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of each House concurring therein,) That the following amendment to the Constitution be, and hereby is, proposed to the States, to become valid when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States as provided in the Constitution:

ARTICLE —.

SEC. 1. From and after A. D. 1900, the manufacture and sale of distilled alcoholic intoxicating liquors, or alcoholic liquors any part of which is obtained by distillation or process equivalent thereto, or any intoxicating liquors mixed or adulterated with ardent spirits, or with any poison whatever, except for medicinal, mechanical, chemical, and scientific purposes and for use in the arts, anywhere within the United States and the Territories thereof, shall cease; and the importation of such liquors from foreign states and countries to the United States and Territories, and the exportation of such liquors from, and the transportation thereof within and through any part of this country, except for the use and purposes aforesaid, shall be, and hereby is, forever thereafter prohibited.

SEC. 2. Nothing in this article shall be construed to waive or abridge any existing power of Congress, nor the right, which is hereby recognized, of the people of any State or Territory to enact laws to prevent the increase and for the suppression or regulation of the manufacture, sale, and use, of liquors and the ingredients therof, any part of which is alcoholic, intoxicating, or poisonous, within its own limits, and for the exclusion of such liquors and ingredients therefrom at any time, as well before as after the close of A. D. 1900; but until then, and until ten years after the ratification hereof, as provided in the next section, no State or Territory shall interfere with the transportation of said liquors or ingredients, in packages safely secured, over the usual lines of traffic to other States and Territories wherein the manufacture, sale, and use thereof, for other purposes and use than those excepted in the first section, shall be lawful: Provided, That the true destination and nature of such packages be plainly marked thereon.

SEC. 3. Should this article not be ratified by three-fourths of the States on or before the last day of December A. D. 1890, then the first section hereof shall take effect and be in force at the expiration of ten years from such ratifications, and the assent of any State to this article shall not be rescinded nor reversed.

SEC. 4. Congress shall enforce this article by all needful legislation.

Mr. LOGAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 7036) to establish post-routes; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

MEXICAN AWARDS.

Mr. EATON. I desire to call up the resolution that I had the honor to offer yesterday, asking for certain information from the Secretary of State.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. EATON on the 7th instant:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, whether any objection has been made by this Government to suits being brought in the courts of the United States by the Government of Mexico against American citizens, and if such objection has been made to communicate to the Senate the diplomatic correspondence, if any, in relation thereto.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to this resolution?

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, on the joint resolution which the Senator from Connecticut introduced a few days ago I desired to submit a statement of facts connected with the business before the commission which I think will aid the Senate very much in reaching a correct conclusion. I presume it will be as much in order to submit what I have to say upon the pending resolution as to wait for the other resolution to be called up. If the Senator from Connecticut has no objection to that proceeding on my part, I will proceed to do so.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will remind the Senator that but five minutes of the morning hour are left.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will occupy only about twenty or thirty minutes. If the Senate will grant me the indulgence, I promise to give what I think has not heretofore been given on this floor, a clear and intelligent statement of the matters complained of—not that others may not do it better than I, but it has not been undertaken.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana asks consent of the Senate to address it at this time upon the subject-matter named by him. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President——

Mr. EATON. I only desire to say one word. The Chair intimated to the Senate and to the Senator from Indiana that there were but five minutes remaining of the morning hour. I simply desire to say to the Senate that if the resolution which is now before us is to be discussed to-day by my friend from Indiana I hope the Senate will also hear the reasons that the mover of the resolution and its friends have for its adoption.

Mr. VOORHEES. I certainly hope so.

Mr. EATON. I do not like this matter to go by piecemeal. If there is to be a discussion let us have a thorough one.

Mr. VOORHEES. The resolution of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] assumes that injustice has been done to the Government of Mexico by the awards mentioned therein. A great deal has been said to the effect that some advantage was taken of that government, as if Mexico had not had a fair chance to protect herself from imposition. A statement of facts will show how far these assumptions are just or unjust.

On the 4th of July, 1868, a treaty was concluded between the Government of the United States and the Government of Mexico, which provided for a commission whose duty it was to hear and determine all claims presented before it for damages sustained by citizens of this country at the hands of citizens of Mexico, and similiar damages sustained by the citizens of Mexico at the hands of citizens of this country. In the early part of 1869, I think in March, commissioners were appointed under that treaty. In April, 1870, now nearly eleven years ago, the claim of Benjamin Weil was filed before that commission. Weil was a citizen of the United States who complained of the loss of property at the hands of certain Mexican forces under the command of General Cortinas. The memorial of Weil, when presented, in April, 1870, necessarily and in fact did specifically describe the kind of property that he alleged he had lost, how much there was of it, how much it was worth, by whom it was taken, the time when it was taken, and the exact place where he was plundered. It is impossible to conceive of plainer, clearer, or more explicit notice given to a defendant than was here given by the memorial of Weil to the authorities of Mexico. He proclaimed exactly what he complained of; he pointed out the place where and the persons by whom he alleged he had been injured, and thereby gave his adversaries every opportunity known in judicial proceedings to follow up and investigate. This case has been discussed as if there had been some concealment, some cunning arts resorted to. In point of fact the petitioner pleaded his claim as openly as if it had been in any court in the world, and put everybody upon full notice and opportunity of investigation.

He named the officer who was in command of the forces which seized his property. All governments keep a roster of their armies. How easy for the authorities of Mexico to have ascertained whether General Cortinas was at the place designated in Weil's memorial at the time of the alleged injury. How easy to have ascertained where he and his command were at that time. No better opportunity was ever given to meet a fraudulent claim if it was one.

Next, let us see whether there was such haste in proceeding to a conclusion as to cut off Mexico from a chance to fully and deliberately present her side of this case. This claim of Weil's lay nearly six years under investigation. It dragged its slow and lazy length along in the open sunlight of day for more than five years, the commission in session a great part of the time, its rooms open, its records open, and Mexico represented by able counsel scrutinizing every step that was taken. Among these counsel was Caleb Cushing. I have not understood that Caleb Cushing was a man easily overreached; I have not heard that his great and lucrative employments sought him because of his easy good nature and willingness to be out-generaled by the other side in a lawsuit. It would seem, however, from the talk in certain quarters in and around this Capitol that the interests of Mexico had been in the hands of incompetent persons, a corps of imbeciles, instead of being, as they were, in the hands of some of the ablest lawyers of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY in the chair.) The morning hour has expired. Is there objection to the Senator continuing? The Chair hears none.

Mr. VOORHEES. I think it will be here conceded that Mexico had all the notice that anybody could have, every possible opportunity to investigate, and longer time than ought to have been given.

On the 8th of October, 1870, counsel for the claimant Weil filed their brief before the commission, nearly all the evidence on which he relied having been filed prior to that time. It will be seen, therefore, that not only by the face of the memorial, but by the evidence itself, from 1870 up to the decision of the claim, Mexico knew all that was alleged, all that was proven, and all that was claimed. What course, however, did the counsel for the Government of Mexico pursue? They almost let judgment go without resistance. The Mexican commissioner afterward attempted to justify the conduct of the agent of Mexico in withholding defensive evidence, said to have been sent to him by his government, on the singular ground that its presentation would have given an opportunity to the claimant to rebut it; as if every plaintiff in a suit has not the right, after the defense puts in its case, to meet such new matter as the defense brings forward. The truth is that the defensive evidence, if they had any, which I very much doubt, was withheld under the mistaken idea that after the commissioners disagreed and the claim went to the umpire Mexico would have the right to file her evidence before the umpire and the plaintiff would not have any right there to meet it.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Allow me to ask a question. When was this claim of fraud first made, after the decree by the arbitrator?

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not know that the claim of fraud has ever been made by the Government of Mexico. I will meet the question of the Senator as well as I know how to meet it in the course of my remarks. He will gather from what I shall say all I know about the subject. Sir Edward Thornton very justly and very correctly said it was not his province to take testimony, that he was simply to take the case as made before the commissioners and decide it upon the evidence before them; to determine between them who was right, the American commissioner who allowed the claim, or the Mexican commissioner who voted against it, as he did in almost every instance where an American was a claimant.

In the face of so many witnesses of respectability, I am unwilling to decide that the facts detailed by them are not true.

I must decide on the proofs and documents filed in the case, and nothing else.

These remain without contradiction by the Government, and, to remove all misapprehensions, I state that I am willing to give every opportunity in my power as a commissioner to the Government to make a full and ample investigation of this claim, and respond to it, and very much wish that this might be done.

But, as this is declined, I must act on the proofs before me. It is now my decision that the United States must have an award for the value of the property, at the time and place of its seizure, with interest.

Here was not only an offer of great liberality upon the part of the American commissioner, but there was absolute solicitation upon his part to those who represented Mexico to do their duty. What was Mr. Wadsworth to do? In a case pending as long as this had been, waiting day after day and year after year for the Mexican authorities to meet a plain, simple claim that had no mystery about it, was he to continue five years more? He did the only thing that an honest man could do; he rendered his decision, which, under the provisions of the treaty, sent the claim to the umpire.

It will not do to contend that new evidence has been discovered which will warrant a new trial. On the contrary, the Mexican commissioner expressly states that he had his evidence in hand at the proper time, and did not put it in because it would give the claimant a chance to rebut it. It is not analogous to a case where the party has tried his case in court and lost it, doing the best he could, and afterward made new discoveries. There equity interposes. But what would be thought in a court of justice of a man who, after losing a case, should arise and say to an enlightened judge, "I have lost my case: I had my evidence in hand and could have offered it, but would not; the case was continued for me for five years, but at last I thought I could on appeal present my evidence where the other side could not rebut it?"

Does this state of facts present sufficient ground to impugn the honor of this country or the validity of this finding? Who is William H. Wadsworth? I know him well. I had the honor to serve with him in the other branch of Congress years ago, and I hazard nothing in stating that for high intelligence, vigilant, careful, conscientious integrity, he never had a superior in the public service. Has he been imposed upon? Did he make up his finding when he ought not to have done so? Did he hurry the decision and exclude a proper opportunity on the part of Mexico? Who will dare to say so? Nobody. Yet after this claimant is dead, and perhaps many of his witnesses, his widow and children and other innocent parties only now interested in it, we hear people about these Halls talking as if Mexico had been deeply and dangerously imposed upon.

But this matter does not stop here. By the terms of the treaty, clear and explicit, all awards under it were to be final and conclusive. Article 2 of the treaty of 1868 reads as follows:

The President of the United States of America, and the President of the Mexican Republic, hereby solemnly and sincerely engage to consider the decision of the commissioners conjointly, or of the umpire, as the case may be, as absolutely final and conclusive upon each claim decided upon by them or him respectively, and to give full effect to such decisions without any objection, evasion, or delay whatsoever.

Should they fail to agree in opinion upon any individual claim, they shall call to their assistance the umpire whom they have agreed to name, or who may be determined by lot, as the case may be; and such umpire, after having examined the evidence adduced for and against the claim, and after having heard, if required, one person on each side as aforesaid, and consulted with the commissioners, shall decide thereupon, finally and without appeal.

Mr. Weil submitted his claim under that article of the treaty, and thereby became a party to it and was bound by it as well as Mexico. Suppose, however, the decision had been against Mr. Weil, would anybody contend that he could have a rehearing and retrial here? It is a notorious fact that American citizens have complained that by fraudulent practices the Mexican authorities have kept them from establishing legal and just claims for damages. I have here in my hand the case of the Rosario and Carmen Silver Mining Company of California. That company had a claim before this commission which was defeated, rejected. The petitioners came to Congress for relief against what they alleged to be an unjust decision procured by fraud on the part of Mexico. In their petition they allege that the Mexican authorities viciously and dishonestly purloined and suppressed material evidence which they had taken and submitted with their claim, by means of which fraudulent suppression of evidence by the Mexican authorities and the introduction by them of evidence of perjured witnesses the claim was decided adversely to them. That is a strong case. What was the result? I suppose nobody will dispute that we should deal as fairly with our own citizens as with those of other countries. I know no reason why the American Congress should discriminate in favor of Mexicans against Americans; yet what was done in this case of the Rosario and Carmen Silver Mining Company? I have here a report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives, made April 24, 1878, in which the doctrine was laid down that a retrial could not be granted; that a settlement under the terms of the treaty was final; that the award was conclusive; that there was no appeal from it.

Afterward application was made on behalf of said mining company directly to the Secretary of State, to which the following answer was returned:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 31, 1879.

SIR: Your letter of the 10th ultimo, with the accompanying documents, was duly received and has been attentively considered. It requests that application be made to the Mexican Government for a rehearing of the case of which you are the representative. Your request is based in part on allegations of perjury by some of the witnesses against your company, and in part upon the authority contained in the act of Congress of the 17th of June last to suspend payment to claimants, citizens of the United States, in certain cases where the Mexican Government had complained of fraud. In reply I have to express my regret that it is deemed inexpedient to comply with your request.

In view of the clear and positive terms of the fifth article of the convention of 1868, this Government has no right to expect a rehearing of the case, and under the circumstances there is believed to be so little probability that such a rehearing would be granted as a matter of favor that even if there were a disposition, which I am sorry to say there is not, to ask such a favor of the Government, it is supposed that the public interests require that no such request should be made.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WM. M. EVARTS.

To E. C. INGERSOLL, Esq.,
Attorney for the Rosario and Carmen Mining Company of California, Washington, D. C.

It would seem, therefore, that neither Congress nor the Department of State find any power under this treaty to relieve American citizens as against a case of fraud even if a fraud exists. I wish, however, next to show that this whole agitation on behalf of the authorities of Mexico is an afterthought—I will not say inspired by men for ulterior and sinister purposes; I will not say that it is done for the purpose of levying blackmail upon every payment that is made and every installment as it becomes due; but I will undertake to say here, and to show, that these very awards in behalf of Weil and the La Abra Silver Company were ratified twice by the deliberate official action of the Mexican Government after they were made. On the 29th of June, 1876, after the decision of these cases by the umpire and the action of the umpire was fully known both by this Government and by Mexico, a treaty was concluded between the two governments providing for a ratification of what the commission had done and for the full execution of its decisions. In that treaty, in article 2, we find the following:

It is further agreed that so soon after the 20th day of November, 1876, as may be practicable, the total amount awarded in all cases already decided, whether by the commissioners or by the umpire, and which may be decided before the said 20th day of November, in favor of citizens of the one party, shall be deducted from the total amount awarded to the citizens of the other party, and the balance, to the amount of $300,000, shall be paid at the city of Mexico, or at the city of Washington, in gold or its equivalent, on or before the 31st day of January, 1877, to the government in favor of whose citizens the greater amount may have been awarded, without interest or any other deduction than that specified in article 6 of the said convention of July, 1868. The residue of the said balance shall be paid in annual installments on the 31st day of January in each year, to an amount not exceeding $300,000, in gold or its equivalent, in any one year, until the whole shall have been paid.

There is a plain treaty stipulation covering every dollar that was awarded by that commission, entered into by Mexico with her eyes open. Now she stands here, or somebody does pretending to act for her, seeking to impeach what she agreed to then, with a full knowledge of all the facts.

More than that, however, on that point. Soon after the ratification of this last treaty noted, a correspondence took place between Mr. Fish, then Secretary of State of the United States, and Mr. Mariscal, minister of Mexico to this Government, and on the 4th of December, 1876, in response to a note from Mr. Mariscal, Secretary Fish used the following strong language:

By article 2 of the convention the two governments bind themselves to consider the decisions of the commissioners and of the umpire as absolutely final and conclusive, and to give full effect to such decisions, without any objection, evasion, or delay whatsoever; and by the fifth article the high contracting parties agree to consider the result of the proceedings of the commission as a full, perfect, and final settlement of every claim upon either government arising from transactions prior to the exchange of ratifications thereof.

It may be quite proper that Mr. Avila should advise you of his views as to any particular awards, or as to any points connected with the closing labors of the commission, and you may have felt it to be your duty to bring to the notice of this Government those views so communicated to you.

I must decline, however, to entertain the consideration of any question which may contemplate any violation of, or departure from, the provisions of the convention as to the final and binding nature of the awards, or to pass upon, or, by silence, to be considered as asquiescing in any attempt to determine the effect of any particular award.

With your appreciation of the objects in contemplation in this method of settlement of differences between two governments, and with your intimate acquaintance with the particular provisions of this convention with reference to the binding character of the awards made by the commissioners or by the umpire, you will readily appreciate my extreme unwillingness to consider that, at the moment when the proceedings relating to the commission have been brought to a close, and the obligation upon each government to consider the result in each case as absolutely final and conclusive becomes perfect, the Government of Mexico has taken, or proposes to take, any steps which would impair this obligation.

Then in response to this statement upon the part of Mr. Fish, that the decisions of the commissioners and of the umpire were absolutely final and conclusive, and that he would not tolerate the idea of any violation or departure from them, the Mexican minister, Mr. Mariscal, disclaimed any such intention on his part or on the part of his government in the following language:

It is not my intention, nor the intention of Sr. Avila, to open any question whatever, nor to put in doubt the final and conclusive character of the above-mentioned awards.

But again. The labors of this commission terminated on the 20th of November, 1876, and soon afterward, on the 14th December, Mr. Fish and Mr. Mariscal made and signed a settlement embracing the expenses of the commission and fixing how they should be borne. It is entitled a "statement of account of the United States and Mexican claims commission," and will be found in House Miscellaneous Document No. 39, second session, Forty-fourth Congress. It will be seen in that account that Mr. Mariscal charged the United States the agreed percentage on all the awards made in favor of its citizens and for the two awards now objected to, namely, those of Weil and La Abra Silver Mining Company. He charged, and was allowed to include in the expense-account of the commission, over forty-six thousand dollars by reason of this recognition on his part and confirmation of what had been done in these cases. In this transaction he was enabled to retain and did retain out of the first annual payment of $300,000 the above amount, the right to which was based solely upon a confirmation on the part of Mexico of the awards in these two cases; otherwise, he had no right whatever to this money.

But there is still much more to show the grave impropriety of the resolution offered at this time by the Senator from Connecticut. By the act of Congress of June 18, 1878, provision was made for the distribution and payment of the awards made by the commission. While that act was under discussion and consideration suggestions were made, it seemed to me at the time, in a sort of vague way, that further consideration ought to be had in these two cases. With a sensitive regard to our own honor we thought too much could not be done to avoid even a suspicion of unfairness toward Mexico. It was for that reason that section 5 of that act was inserted. By that section the President of the United States was empowered and "requested to investigate any charges of fraud presented by the Mexican Government as to the cases hereinafter named, and if he shall be of the opinion that the honor of the United States, the principles of public law, or considerations of justice and equity require that the awards in the cases of Benjamin Weil and La Abra Silver Mining Company, or either of them, should be opened and the cases retried, it shall be lawful for him to withhold payment of said awards, or either of them, until such case or cases shall be retried and decided in such manner as the governments of the United States and Mexico may agree, or until Congress shall otherwise direct." Then it was further provided in that section that any moneys accruing under these awards should be held to abide the President's investigation and determination.

It will be remembered that this act, the fifth section of which I have partially read, became a law nearly three years ago. For more than two years after its passage—to be exact, two years and two months—the Executive Department held entire control of these claims and of all questions relating to them, whether they ought to be retried, whether they ought to be reinvestigated. For more than two years they were there in the Executive Department of the Government, subject to any charges that Mexico might bring against them, subject to any steps that might be taken, those interested in them waiting patiently for a conclusion, and, finally, that conclusion came. It came last August, in a direct order from the President of the United States to pay the money due under these awards, determining that there was no ground of fraud on which to retry them, that Mexico had not made herself felt or heard to such an extent in the Executive Department of the Government as to require a rehearing. During those two years and more there was no want of attention to this subject; on the contrary the Secretary of State heard argument repeatedly for and against the claims, able gentlemen appearing on both sides, thoroughly sifting every allegation that was made. More than that; shortly before the payment was ordered distinguished counsel appeared ostensibly on behalf of Mexico, and asked for delay until they could bring suit in the courts. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has stated, and stated correctly, on the floor of the Senate that Mexico had the right to go into our courts and sue or ask for an injunction against any citizen of the United States. When it became apparent that the Executive Department would pay this money, as I have said, distinguished counsel appeared there and asked for additional delay, in order to enable them to bring some sort of action. The delay was promptly granted and weeks elapsed again before payment was made. No suit has been brought; every opportunity has been given; our courts have been open to Mexico; time has been given; and it seems monstrous that now, at the end of nearly eleven years since this action commenced, and nearly six years since it was decided, it should be reagitated.

But still further: at the last session of Congress a bill was introduced by the Senator from Alabama seeking to reopen these claims and send them to the courts. Exactly why this was done I do not know, inasmuch as Mexico had already the power to go there; but the bill had one good effect, at least, it brought this whole question to the consideration of the Committee on the Judiciary, and that eminent and learned committee, taking a full view of the whole case, reported back that there was nothing for this Government to do in the premises; that it had done its duty; and there was nothing left except to execute what had been determined according to law.

Sir, I need not assure the Senator from Connecticut that I know him to be actuated in this proceeding, as in all others, by the highest motives, and by the purest sense of honor, but I appeal to his well-known candor to say whether enough has not already been done to vindicate our honor as a Government.

Is there never to be an end to motions, resolutions, and proposed investigations on a subject that was finally disposed of years ago? During the present session of Congress the matter of these two awards and the right to reopen them was fully considered by the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, resulting in the action of the committee against any such right or duty.

It is well to remember that all awards made by the commission are payable in annual installments, and they have eight or nine years yet to run. If, as each pay-day approaches, a suggestion from somebody to the effect that there was fraud in some of the awards shall cause Congress to enter upon an annual investigation, I would congratulate those who are about to leave this body rather than those who will remain. I sincerely hope the Senator from Connecticut will withdraw his resolution, and if not, that it will be voted down.

Mr. EATON. I do not wish to detain the Senate. I will only say a few words. I desire that the pending resolution, which I offered yesterday, may now be reported, and on that I have a word to say.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, whether any objection has been made by this Government to suits being brought in the courts of the United States by the Government of Mexico against American citizens, and if such objection has been made, to communicate to the Senate the diplomatic correspondence, if any, in relation thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.) If the Senator will allow the Chair, he will lay before the Senate its unfinished business, which can be temporarily laid aside, and the Senator will then be recognized.

The bill (H. R. No. 6532) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, was read by its title.

Mr. EATON. I do not propose at this time to go into a full discussion of this matter. I desire the passage to-day of the pending resolution, asking for information which, in my judgment, the Senate ought to have before it finally passes upon the joint resolution which I had the honor of introducing several days since. I want all the correspondence, the diplomatic correspondence, if compatible with the public interests, between our own and the authorities of the Mexican Government, in order that the Senate of the United States may see whether really the courts of the United States have been open to the Government of Mexico; that is, open in the opinion of the Mexican officials. I do not propose on this occasion to arraign the Secretary of State. That is not necessary; it would not be proper for me to do it; but I desire that the correspondence between the Secretary of State and the Mexican officials shall be laid before the Senate in order that the Senate may see what the effect of that correspondence inevitably has been upon the Mexican authorities.

I desire to say here that in my judgment—and I have given not a little attention to one of these claims, a good deal to both, a great deal to one—I do not believe there was one single bale of cotton belonging to the claimant who charged against the Republic of Mexico the loss of 1,900 bales of cotton. There was not anything to make either woof or wool of. That is my opinion with regard to this matter. I believe it was the baldest case of fraud that ever was perpetrated on the face of the earth.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Let me ask the Senator how it escaped the attention of the arbitrators?

Mr. EATON. It escaped the attention of the arbitrators because the evidence was not in the possession of the Mexican authorities until after the commission had themselves risen, and when it was carried to the umpire, Sir Edward Thornton—a very distinguished gentleman—Sir Edward Thornton said these words:

In the case No. 447, Benjamin Weil vs. Mexico, the agent of Mexico has produced circumstantial evidence, which, if not refuted by the claimant, would certainly contribute to the suspicion that perjury has been committed, and that the whole claim is a fraud. For the reason already given it is not in the power of the umpire to take that evidence into consideration; but if perjury shall be proved hereafter, no one would rejoice more than the umpire himself that his decision should be reversed and that justice should be done.

As I said, I do not desire to go into a full discussion of this matter to-day. I introduced the resolution because I believe that the honor of the United States demanded that further action should be taken. I brought it in because, as a Senator of the United States, I felt it to be my absolute duty to do it, feeling that injustice had been done to a sister republic. Let the resolution which I offered yesterday be passed; let the correspondence between the Secretary of State and the Mexican authorities come before the Senate, and you will see in what position the Mexican authorities here feel themselves to be. You will see whether they thought it proper and prudent to go into the courts of the United States.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. What was inside the claim?

Mr. EATON. I think if there has been a claim it is made out of raw material, that it was covered so all over with fraud that there was not any inside to it, that it was all fraud from the beginning to the end. I incline to the opinion that no treaty, no convention, and no action of umpires or commissioners, can prevent or ought to prevent the Government of the United States from giving to the authorities of Mexico every opportunity to show that fraud.

As I said, I have examined this question with great thoroughness. I find no fault with any gentleman who differs with me. I am not about to attack the American commissioner, Mr. Wadsworth of Kentucky; I am not about to attack the umpire, Sir Edward Thornton, but I say here, on my honor as an American Senator, that this matter ought to be opened.

Mr. BAILEY. What is the evidence?

Mr. EATON. The evidence I do not care to go into here. This man was proved to have been seven hundred miles from the very place that he swore he was present, where his cotton was taken, and it was proved by his own letters.

Mr. BAILEY. Did not Mexico have the proof?

Mr. EATON. It was impossible for Mexico at that time to arrive at that proof. I am inclined to think that my distinguished friend from Indiana was mistaken when he said, if he did say all, that all of this proof was withheld from the commission. I undertake to say that my reading of the case is that this proof was not in the hands of the agents of Mexico at the time of the holding of the sessions of the commission. Other proof was.

Mr. VOORHEES. What I said was this——

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. EATON. Oh, yes.

Mr. McDONALD. I will read what the Secretary of State says in regard to these claims, especially in regard to the Weil claim. In his report to the President in pursuance of the fifth section of the act of 1878, he says:

In the conclusions to which I came, and which I had the honor to submit to your examination, I was principally governed by the following considerations:

1. In the complaints of the Mexican Government there is not the slightest impeachment, express or implied, of the character or composition of the commission, of its methods of procedure, or of the entire regularity and integrity of its actual proceedings. It was composed of able and eminent men, enjoying the full confidence of the governments by whom they were respectively appointed, and the umpire selected, Sir Edward Thornton, was pre-eminently fitted for his laborious and responsible duties by his long diplomatic experience, his recognized ability, his high character, and his special knowledge of the two countries whose citizens and governments were interested in the arbitration.

2. Before this commission the Government of Mexico had full opportunity and ample time to present its defense, both in evidence and argument, against any claim that was submitted. In the La Abra case a large amount of testimony was taken on both sides, the comparison and valuation of which was within the power of the commission, and the opinion of the umpire shows that it was carefully considered.

In the Weil case it is true that the Mexican Government submitted no testimony, and that the case was decided upon the evidence offered by the claimants. But the Mexican commissioner explicitly declined the offer of further time to produce such testimony, although he professed that his government had such in possession, saying upon the trial:

"There is in the present case the still more serious consideration that there is sufficient evidence upon which to judge of the claim, and that by opening the door to new testimony it would only serve to show the claimant wherein the edifice which he had erected upon his imagination was weak, and by enlightening him how to crown his intrigue by new efforts, which, although they would not change the aspect of the case, might lead him to confirm it."

Now the Secretary expressly states——

Mr. EATON. I do not care to have a speech interjected into mine.

Mr. McDONALD. I do not desire to interject a speech into the Senator's. I simply wanted to read what the Secretary of State said.

Mr. EATON. He does not go to the extent of seeking this action at all. That there was testimony which was withheld I know, and I know further that the important testimony had not yet been discovered, and the Secretary of State did not undertake to say to the contrary, and if he did he would be in error.

Mr. VOORHEES. As the Senator from Connecticut arraigns my statement, I say that the Secretary of State does state that there was no evidence submitted on the part of Mexico in the Weil claim, although the commissioner says he had such evidence, and gives the further reason that he proposes to enable the claimant to rebuild or strengthen his edifice, in the figurative language of the commissioner for Mexico; in other words, to give the claimant a chance of rebuttal. I say the statement of the Secretary of State here bears me out entirely that the Mexican commissioner said he had evidence, and declined to put it in on the ground that that would enable the claimant to rebut it.

Mr. EATON. What I say is this, and if either of the Senators from Indiana, and if the Secretary of State will take the trouble to examine the evidence that is now in, where everybody can read it, he will ascertain the great fact that these vital proofs were not within the power of Mexico at the time. That there was a certain class of evidence, which evidence was not submitted, is true, I make no question about; but the whole evidence was not in. The fact that this man Weil was seven hundred miles from the point where he swore he was when the cotton was taken from him was not in their possession, and they had not that testimony.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. How is that made to appear?

Mr. EATON. It is made to appear by a letter written by Weil himself from Shreveport, in Louisiana, upon a certain day, on which day he alleges that he was below Matamoras in person, in his sworn proof; and there were several other things in connection with it——

Mr. JONES, of Florida. He swore he was at another place?

Mr. EATON. Certainly, and he was seven hundred miles off on that same indentical day, if I am not mistaken. He swore he was there when the cotton was taken from him.

Mr. VOORHEES. If the Senator will allow me a moment, I do not dispute the ability of Mexico or of Mexicans to manufacture testimony, especially after a man is dead, and even to the extent of forging letters. The point that I make here, and the point at issue between the Senator from Connecticut and myself, is while this case was pending in a court open to everybody and the record of which was under inspection, and where Mexico was represented by gentlemen among the ablest counsel in this country, for more than five years, and then solicited by the American commissioner, put in their entire case, proceeding to a judgment reluctantly, and the commissioner of Mexico saying that he had testimony and declined to put any of it in, not some of it but none of it—whether under these circumstances this is a proper subject for rehearing. Three years ago the Congress of the United States sent it to the President of the United States, to the State Department, for a rehearing and a retrial if they should find that it ought to be done.

Mr. EATON. I think my friend ought not to repeat the speech he has made before.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will not interrupt the Senator.

Mr. EATON. My friend has just said what he said before, that this power had been given two years ago, more or less, to the President of the United States, and yet he held it up two years, and did not disburse these moneys. Why did he not disburse these moneys? Because of the allegation of fraud, because of the belief that there had been perjury here in the establishing of these claims. And now for some reason—I hardly know what the reason is—although the evidence is directly to the point and is brought before a new commission, or before the Secretary of State, or before the Congress of the United States, it is not proposed to hold this matter one year, one month, one day longer.

I do not wish to go further into the discussion of this matter today. I believe that the honor of the United States ought to be protected by taking care of the interests of Mexico.

My friend from Indiana suggested something about forging letters after a man was dead. If letters have been forged after a man was dead, I apprehend that such letters would not constitute good testimony in the opinion of the Senator from Indiana, or in my opinion, or in the opinion of anybody else who would have this matter in hand to investigate hereafter. My understanding of it is that there has been no forgery of letters upon the part of the Government of Mexico or its officials, and it is too late in the day for Senators to say on this floor that we cannot open this matter because it has been finally adjudged, when by a law of Congress it has been held in the hands of the President of the United States for two years and more than two years. It will hardly become citizens of the United States, not to say Senators of the United States, to say that if there was a case of bald fraud here we would not notice it, when this very moment the leading journals of Great Britain and many of its leading men are taking into consideration the great fact of the perjury that was committed with regard to the fishery award, and a leading paper in Great Britain says if the allegation can be sustained, no matter about the convention or the treaty, the money must go back to the United States where it belongs.

I say that if the President of the United States have in his hands a million or two of dollars belonging to the Government of Mexico originally, but sent here for the purpose of being distributed, and if part of the claims the money is to meet be covered all over with wrong and fraud, it is the duty of the United States to withhold that money, and it is the duty of the United States to look into this matter thoroughly and fairly. I desire the resolution to pass so that we may have the information from the Secretary of State with regard to that one matter, and hereafter I shall take occasion to call up the joint resolution which I introduced some days ago.

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. President——

Mr. BOOTH. I feel it my duty to call for the regular order.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Chair have the resolution reported?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK read the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California insist upon his call for the regular order?

Mr. McDONALD. I wish just a moment.

Mr. BOOTH. I will yield for a minute.

Mr. McDONALD. For five minutes?

Mr. BOOTH. I must in fairness call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is called for.

Mr. EATON. I hope we shall have a vote on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. BOOTH. If it is the desire of the Senate to vote on the resolution, and if the Senator from Indiana has no objection to taking a vote upon it, I will yield.

Mr. McDONALD. I have no objection whatever, but I desire to say just about ten words.

Mr. BOOTH. I will yield for ten words.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana.

Mr. McDONALD. I desire to call the attention of the Senate a little more particularly to the statement of the Secretary of State, and I do not understand that to have been controverted. He says:

In the Weil case, it is true that the Mexican Government submitted no testimony, and that the case was decided upon the evidence offered by the claimants. But the Mexican commissioner explicitly declined the offer of further time to produce such testimony, although he professed that his government had such in possession, saying upon the trial, &c.

I simply desire to say that there is not a court in the United States that would grant to a private litigant a new trial upon an application for that purpose, if he should present such a petition as that. I desire to state further, that if Mexico has any complaint in regard to the action arising under that commission, it should be addressed to secure a new convention, in which the parties who have lost their claims by fraud may have an opportunity to present them again. What I have contended against from the beginning is that there should be this one-sided effort acquiesced in by our Government, to relieve Mexico from these two awards and hold our people bound by all the others. The purpose of the fifth section of the act of 1878 was to clothe the executive department of the Government with precisely that power, and I am willing to continue it if it is necessary; but I shall not vote for a new trial in an ex parte application of this kind to a claimant who stands in the position that the Secretary of State has shown that the Mexican Government stands with reference to this claim.

Mr. BOOTH rose.

Mr. WHYTE. If the Senator will allow me to say just one word, the Senator from Indiana has struck the key-note of this whole question. If we are going to do anything to protect Mexico in regard to claims that have been passed against her by the joint convention, I hope we will also do something for those citizens of the United States whose claims were excluded either by the negligence of officers of this Government or by want of proper notice to them that that commission was sitting in this city. I know men with claims; I know specially of one claim, of a citizen of the United States whose coal was seized by Mexican authority, who made a protest before the consul at Vera Cruz and filed it there for the governance of our Government here at Washington, which through the negligence of that consul was not filed in the State Department; and that claimant, or his heirs, for he died shortly afterward, had no notice of this convention at all.

Mr. EATON. That was not the fault of Mexico.

Mr. WHYTE. It was the fault of the commission that proper notice was not given to the various claimants, the notice being published, as is claimed, in but one paper in New Orleans so far as I can ascertain, and no copy of that paper having ever been discovered or produced to show that it was actually published. I say that claim was lost because the Government here had no notice of the protest in Mexico and the claimants, the heirs of the gentleman who had died, had no notice of the sitting of the commission. Therefore if we are to protect Mexico against fraudulent claims, I hope the Government of the United States will protect its own citizens who have just claims which have been unpaid by Mexico.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President——

Mr. BOOTH. I must insist on the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair.) The Senator from California insists on the regular order.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. What is the regular order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pension appropriation bill.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. With the permission of the Senator——

Mr. BOOTH. I cannot yield for any purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will lay before the Senate the regular order.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6532) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. PLUMB, after line 17 of section 1, to insert:

To provide fifty additional examiners for the Pension Office, and the number of clerks for the Pension Office and Adjutant-General's and Surgeon-General's Offices, respectively, necessary to render effective the work of said examiners, the sum of $200,000, to be immediately available.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I should like to see that amendment a moment.

Mr. BOOTH. So far as I am personally concerned, I have no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. BOOTH. I beg pardon.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I have a word to say in regard to this matter. After concluding my remarks yesterday I was called out of the Senate Chamber to attend a special meeting of the Post-Office Committee. Upon my return I found that the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. WITHERS] had been defeated, which I very much regretted. I voted yesterday that that amendment was in order. I did that with a good deal of doubt as to the correctness of my vote, but for the purpose of availing myself of a chance to vote for something that would tend to improve the present condition of affairs.

I would suggest to the Senator from Kansas, however, who offered the pending amendment, that if additional clerks are to be placed in the Pension Office, my understanding is that additional room will have to be provided for them. The amendment should be amended so as to allow the application of a portion of the fund to pay the rent of a building for their use. My understanding is that the present building occupied by the Pension Bureau is full, and it is no use for us to employ clerks unless we can have room for them to work in. I suggest that to the Senator who offered the amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator from Iowa is informed upon that subject sufficiently to frame an amendment which will meet the point which he urges, I shall have no objection to it.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Let me look at it again.

Mr. PLUMB. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa that his proposition be made the subject of a separate amendment, when the pending amendment has been adopted, if it shall be agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It had better be submitted as an amendment to this amendment, because the next one may not be thought to be in order.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Unless the Senator who offers the amendment thinks it is well to provide for the employment of clerks without making any provision for places where they may work, I suggest that after the word "examiners" in the first line of the amendment he insert "and for rent for additional rooms or buildings therefor." That would obviate the difficulty that seems to me to be somewhat pressing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa offer that as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I offer it as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "examiners," in the first line of the amendment, it is proposed to insert "and for rent for additional rooms or buildings therefor;" so as to read:

To provide fifty additional examiners, and for rent for additional rooms or buildings therefor, for the Pension Office, and the number of clerks for the Pension Office and Adjutant-General's and Surgeon-General's Offices, respectively, necessary to render effective the work of said examiners, the sum of $200,000, to be immediately available.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] as amended.

Mr. KERNAN. On behalf of a great many deserving men, I believe something should be done to speed the adjudication of the claims pending for pensions. The war closed more than fifteen years ago. There are now, as we are informed, more than 250,000 claims pending in the Pension Bureau. Every Senator and every Member gets day after day letters from people in his State or locality asking him to get such a claim speeded and such a claim speeded. We all know that that cannot be done. Here is this very large number of claims pending. Doubtless a very large number of them are deserving, as the claimants believe, and as probably is true, and it is really a denial of justice to leave these claimants for so many years without having their claims decided upon. Those which are just should be allowed; the deserving soldiers of the war should be paid their pensions; and those claims which cannot be maintained ought to be rejected, so that the claimants may know that the bureau thinks they are not entitled to pensions. I feel almost depressed when I realize how many of these claims there are, and how many deserving soldiers and their widows cannot get action upon their claims when they believe they have their proofs to entitle them to pensions.

I am in favor of this amendment in the hope and belief that, if nothing else can be done at this session, it will enable the Commissioner to add to the efficiency and strength of his force so as to dispose of these claims more rapidly. Nothing is more unjust than to delay the claims of deserving men, soldiers who entered the service on the pledge of the Government that if by disease or wounds incurred in the war they lost their health they should have a pension. Half of them, here in the year 1881, when the war closed early in 1865, have been writing and writing and seeking to get action on their claims. I think the Government owes it to itself, it owes it to them, to give at least this measure of relief, and I hope there can be something done to speed their cases far more rapidly in their determination than this will do. I am in favor of the amendment, hoping it will do something in the way of bringing about the determination of these claims.

Mr. WALLACE. It is strange that the Senate and the House should undertake in this way to relieve the Pension Bureau when neither the officer in charge of that bureau nor any one connected with the Government has ever asked for this special mode of assistance. They seek a remedy in a different line, by a court, through judicial processes and not by clerks added; their wishes come to us by the bill of the Senator from Virginia, and in a different form from this proposition. There is no estimate in the Book of Estimates for additional clerks; there seems to be no requirement for this force from the Department of the Interior, or any one authorized to demand it——

Mr. INGALLS. May I interrupt the Senator a moment?

Mr. WALLACE. Certainly.

Mr. INGALLS. At the close of the Commissioner's last report he says:

I respectfully submit the following recommendations:

1. That there be an increase in the number of clerkships of the classes 1, 2, 3, and 4.

2. That the chiefs of divisions and the appeal clerk, who are selected from among the clerks of class 4, be given an additional allowance of $600 each per annum.

3. That the salary of the chief clerk be increased to $2,500 per annum.

4. That the salary of the Deputy Commissioner of Pensions be increased to $3,000 per annum.

5. That the salary of the Commissioner be increased to $6,000.

He does ask for an additional number of clerkships in classes 1, 2, 3, and 4.

Mr. WALLACE. How many does he want? The number is not fixed, few or many, but the great desire there expressed is for increase of salary to those now at work. I do not think that this request is in the Book of Estimates furnished the Appropriations Committee. I have heard nothing of it in the Committee on Appropriations. Neither I nor the others knew anything of this in our consultations in that committee. This statement is made as the Senator read it I do not doubt, and if these clerks be really needed I have no doubt that Congress will be very glad to give them to aid in the much needed expedition. Will the pending amendment answer the purpose? Will it give the relief desired? Is there not some other remedy beyond this required? The Commissioner evidently thinks this will not answer, for he gives all his energy to the measure submitted by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. WITHERS.] He feels, as most of us do, that a remedy must be found in some other line.

The point to be reached, it seems to me, is to bring the judicial mind to bear upon the facts of each case in some way. The proposition of the Senator from Virginia, the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, was a measure in the right direction, but it had its defects, and was liable to many objections. I could not bring my mind to support it. It has been ruled out of order, but I may briefly refer to it. There were many difficulties surrounding it. Among the first was that it was the institution of a batch of new courts in each State which were strange to the people; these were heretofore utterly unknown in our system, were not in the line of the common law, and in effect it was the creation of new tribunals strange to the people. The second objection is, that it adds large additional expense and multiplies officials throughout the country, while we are already oppressed by their number. The third objection, in my mind, is that it was possible for this court, if it saw fit so to do for any purpose, to become an oppressor and a tyrant over the pensioner himself. I do not say that they would be so, but new tribunals, vested with complete power over the subject given them, may exercise that power for improper purposes, and I fear they would.

Where is the difficulty in the way of sending every pensioner to his own locality for adjustment and decree by his own courts? Why is there any difficulty in the plan of sending each pensioner resident within a county in the State in which he resides, to his home court there—a court of record, of course; not to a single official, nor yet to the process of a jury trial, but allowing him to be heard before the court upon his depositions taken and to be taken in his own case? Under such a system he would be at home among his own people, where he is known, where his witnesses reside, and where the court can examine his case on his testimony and standing and determine it thereon, and on his already existing depositions; or the court may refer the matter to a commissioner or master, and thus arrive at the merits of his case after full investigation. He can be fully heard. The papers from the Pension Office can be sent there upon certificate; the court after hearing can render its decree; and that may be made final and conclusive in the case, and thus we may have an adjudication of these claims, speedily and justly. A home forum with a fair hearing is the best remedy for this clogged Department. Jurisdiction can be vested in the State courts in such matters, and I do not doubt that they would accept it and act.

But wherever there exists a district court of the United States we should give it power to hear the cases resident there of course, but outside of the counties in which exists United States district courts why shall we not use existing machinery? The people own State courts in which pensioner and Government may both be heard if they are willing to exercise this jurisdiction. In the case of a pensioner who is alleged to be fraudulently on the rolls, or of one who wants his claim expedited, we can send him there summarily or upon rule to show cause in which ever form we prefer. If after full hearing the court decrees him to be stricken from the roll all will agree that he is there by fraud, for it is only done after full hearing upon testimony brought into court where both he and the Government have been heard. Such a decree is only made after hearing upon testimony duly taken and entered of record. If it is desired to expedite a case we can send all these that now stand undetermined on the records of the Pension Office there to be carefully examined upon the papers in the office upon additional depositions, and upon the testimony of men who know him, his services, and his diseases. I venture to say that no State court would decline to take jurisdiction, and that the Legislatures of the State would promptly give this added jurisdiction if this were needed in order to accomplish the results we all desire. And if so, six months' work will clean up this enormous list. The amendment proposed by myself I now ask the Clerk to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add as additional sections to the bill:

SEC. 3. That for the purpose of discovering and preventing frauds upon the United States in regard to pensions, the Commissioner of Pensions, in addition to the powers now conferred upon him by law, shall have the right to cite any person now upon the pension rolls to appear before any district court of the United States, if such there be, within the county or parish in which the pensioner resides, or if none such there be, then before any court of record having a clerk and a seal within such county or parish, there to show cause why his name should not be stricken from the roll of pensioners; and such court shall hear the case upon depositions taken in the usual manner, and upon the proofs, certificates, depositions, and affidavits now on file in the Pension Office, which, for that purpose, shall be certified by the Commissioner of Pensions to such court.

SEC. 4. That in order to expedite the settlement of claims for pensions and arrears thereof now on file in the Pension Office, the Commissioner of Pensions is hereby directed to forthwith certify all such claims which have been on the files over six months and cannot be adjudicated by him within ninety days from the passage of this act, together with all papers, testimony, certificates, or other documents filed in or bearing upon each case, to the district court of the United States in the county or parish in which the person claiming such pension resides, or if there be no district court of the United States within such county or parish, then to any court of record having a clerk and a seal within such county or parish, there to be examined by the said court upon the papers, testimony, certificates, or other documents so certified, and such other depositions, proofs, and testimony as may be submitted touching the same, under the rules and regulations hereinafter prescribed.

SEC. 5. That the person receiving or claiming a pension under this act shall be deemed to be in such court for all purposes touching his said case after the said court shall have before it a citation to him to appear in the same on a day certain, which shall, by oath thereto affixed, appear to have been served by a copy thereof mailed by the Commissioner of Pensions to his address at least twenty days prior to such day of appearance; and each of said courts is hereby vested with full jurisdiction to proceed upon written evidence to examine, adjudicate, and settle the question at issue under the proofs so brought before it and the laws regulating pensions, and its decree thereon shall be final and conclusive. If the said court shall adjudge the pensioner not entitled to a pension, his name shall be stricken from the rolls, or his claim taken as dismissed, as the case may be. If the court shall adjudge the applicant entitled to a pension, his name shall be placed upon the rolls at the rate per month fixed by the court; and no interference with or alteration of the said decree or of the sum so paid shall be permitted except upon action had in the same court, after formal notice for a rehearing as herein prescribed.

SEC. 6. That the district attorney of the United States in counties in which there is a district court, and the person in charge of prosecutions for crimes in other counties or parishes, shall act as counsel for the United States in all pension cases in such courts, and shall be entitled to a fee of $10 in each case, to be paid by the United States. Costs of witnesses shall be paid by the United States when summoned by them under the first section hereof, but in no other case. The pensioner or the applicant himself may be examined under oath and his testimony be competent evidence in the adjudication of his case when cross-examined by the counsel of the United States, but not otherwise. The Attorney-General of the United States is hereby directed to make and publish a code of rules, as simple and direct as possible, regulating the mode of procedure in the cases hereinbefore named, which rules when so made are hereby prescribed for the guidance of the said courts in all pension cases coming before them under this act.

Mr. LOGAN. Do I understand the Senator to propose this as an amendment to this bill?

Mr. WALLACE. I intended to move it as an amendment to the bill, but as a matter of course the point of order made would rule it out. By this amendment I desire to express my anxiety as other Senators have done to the Senate, first, to aid in preventing the perpetration of the alleged frauds upon the Pension Department of the Government of the United States; and, secondly, to expedite the settlement, as far as may be by any suggestions I can give the Senate, of the pension cases that now hang unsettled in the Pension Department. This is simply the thought of carrying to the local courts in which the pensioner resides, first, the cases in which the Commissioner of Pensions alleges there are frauds; in such the pensioner is brought into court, and the question of fraud is heard and settled. Second, to send to the local court, the district court of the United States, or any court of record in the county where the pensioner resides, the cases now pending in the Pension Office, there to be heard on the papers now on file in the Pension Office, and upon such other depositions and papers as may be taken by either side in the future, and thus have the question of the right to a pension settled at the home of the pensioner, not by trial by jury, but by the examination of witnesses upon depositions, or by reference of the case to a commissioner or master who shall hear and report upon the same to the court, which in either case shall hear the proofs summarily and make a decree of the court thereon either for or against the claimant. My purpose is to endeavor to bring what aid I can to this subject. The means I would adopt are, first, the settlement of the question of fraud in the courts of the locality; and, second, the rapid adjustment there of the cases now pending in such vast numbers. Of course this amendment is liable to the point of order, as the amendment of the Senator from Virginia was. I simply desired to explain it, and leave it to the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to call the Senator's attention to one proposition he has in this measure of his. Of course I do not wish to discuss it, because it cannot come up for action. The section providing for the soldier being called before a United States judge, to show cause why his name should not be stricken from the roll as a pensioner, is certainly very peculiar language. In other words, it indicts the soldier and brings him before the court and he must prove his innocence of having defrauded the Government, or he is dismissed from the roll. What is the meaning of it?

Mr. WALLACE. Not at all. It is simply a rule upon him to show cause, to come in upon the allegation that he is fraudulently receiving a pension. What simpler method can there be? An allegation is made in the county in which he lives, and he meets it there at home.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand that; but the Senator provides that the pensioner shall show cause why he shall not be stricken from the roll. Did we ever hear of a man being arraigned in a court to show cause why he should not be sent to the penitentiary? It is the business of the prosecution to show cause why he shall be committed; but this is reversing all the rules of evidence and law. If the Government wants to act fairly it will call a man up and the Government will show cause why he should be dismissed from the roll, and not require a pensioner to show cause why he should not be dismissed from the roll. That is certainly reversing the rules.

Mr. WALLACE. That is a very trifling matter of detail. The question is, after all, where is the forum in which this man who is alleged to be a fraudulent pensioner ought to be heard. I allege that it is at his home and before a local court. That is the whole question, and the form of it is not material at all. He is not to be indicted, he is simply to be cited to appear and if you see fit to strike out the words "show cause," I am content with that amendment. If the Senator prefers the language he suggests I am content to amend it.

Mr. LOGAN. I said this cited him to show cause, and this amendment was like an indictment against him to show cause why he should not be punished; it called on him to show cause why he should not be dismissed from the roll. That reverses all the rules of evidence that I have ever heard of in any court.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senator from Illinois if that is not a mere technical phrase, which does not put the burden of proof on the man cited? It is a rule general in all equity processes, in all notices to respondents to petitions, to come into court and show cause why the prayer of the petition should not be granted. It does not change the burden of proof at all.

I desire, however, to make the point of order on the amendment because I do not think it worth while to spend a day in debating it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair.) The amendment has not been offered.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to spend time either; but I desire to call attention to the fact—it may be technical or it may not be technical—that this is not like a chancery proceeding. This man is accused of crime; that is, he is to be dismissed from the roll because he is fraudulently on the roll; hence it is an accusation of fraud against him. Being fraudulently on the roll he can be dismissed, and hence the requirement for him to show cause why he shall not be dismissed does bring it in the nature of a criminal proceeding, because he is accused of a crime, for if he is fraudulently on the roll it is a crime.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, I do not rise to discuss the proposition suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania. I say, however, that when the Committee on Pensions or any other committee shall present a separate bill to facilitate the speedy adjudication of these claims in what I deem a fit and proper way, I shall certainly support it. But as I know this measure will be ruled out on a question of order, I wish to say one word on the amendment which has been held to be in order appropriating $200,000 to enable the Commissioner of Pensions to employ more examiners and more clerks to speed the present machinery or action on these claims. It is no answer to that amendment to say that the Commissioner has not asked it. It is the duty of Congress to see that there is sufficient means appropriated to enable him to proceed more rapidly than he can do with the present force; and as that is in order, and as that very likely is all that can be done at this session, I trust that amendment will be adopted, and that we shall instruct the Commissioner to employ more force and to go on more rapidly than he can do now.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I have taken no part in this discussion because, though a member of the Committee on Appropriations, although I listened carefully to the arguments, I have never professed to be familiar with military affairs or with questions relating to safeguards necessary to be thrown around pensions; but the amendment now offered, if sustained by the Senate, will do no good except to enable the bureau to spend that much more money, I think in a useless if not an improper way. The Commissioner of Pensions does not pretend that he has not force enough now. He came before the committee and asked us to increase the salaries of a few of the employés that he has, his own included, as his report shows, but no suggestion was made as to the necessity of any such additional force as is here demanded. Now, on the suggestion of a Senator, without recommendation from the Department, without suggestion of the necessity for it before the committee, without anything to indicate that it would do any possible good, we are called upon to rent additional buildings and give $200,000 more for clerks, and all for what? Under the admittedly defective system we now have, which it seems cannot be amended, we are urged to hurry through the great number of claims on the files that have been presented within the last two years, growing out of the greed of gain from the arrears-of-pensions bill, so that an immense amount of money may be made by claim agents, which they will secure if they can put through fraudulent claims in hot haste and escape detection, under pretext of doing prompt justice to honest claimants.

What the Commissioner desires, and what I think every Senator ought to desire, is a change of the system and a more public and efficient means of determining who are entitled to pensions, then pay them, and pay them promptly; but surely we ought to prevent those who are not entitled to pensions from receiving them.

The Senate has voted down or ruled out of order such a measure, and seems determined that there shall be no investigation into frauds, but that there shall be as many more clerks and employés who know nothing about it pushed into the Pension Office, even against the will of the Commissioner, so as to expedite the passage of the pending cases, whether fraudulent or not.

The Senator from California, the other day, alluding to some remarks I had made on another occasion, seemed to think that I had done injustice in my statement about arrears of pensions. The Commissioner of Pensions, after showing the immense stimulant that had been given to fraudulent claims by reason of the passage of the arrears-of-pensions bill, recapitulates thus:

|---|---|
| Amount of arrears to old pensioners | $25,293,963 66 |
| First payments previous to July 1, 1880 | 8,821,826 09 |
| Arrears in pending claims | 192,000,847 50 |
| Annual pensions to 125,000 new pensioners | 284,185,000 00 |
| Total | 510,301,673 25 |

In stating this total I omit any account of the annual pensions to the new pensioners whose claims were on file in the office at the time of the passage of the arrears acts, but barred from further prosecution by section 4717, Revised Statutes, which was repealed by that act. The claims thereby revived number twenty thousand or thirty thousand.

Then he shows what it will include.

Third.—

He says:

Third. As to the amount annually paid out upon fraudulent pensions and claims. Under the secret ex parte system now in vogue for obtaining the evidence in support of claims, frauds are generally brought to the attention of the office by accident, such as an oversight or mistake on the part of the person attempting to commit the fraud, or voluntary information from some neighbor. Under such conditions, but a small percentage of the frauds are discovered, but even under these unfavorable circumstances, during the four years ending June 30, 1880, 1,561 pensioners were discovered who were illegally drawing pensions, and 1,567 claims were defeated, in which the claimants had already established, prima facie, their right to a pension. A very small percentage, probably not exceeding 5 per cent. of each of these classes, have been, or will finally be, restored to the rolls or allowed a pension, upon refuting the evidence tending to show fraud. The amount saved to the Government in accrued pension and annual pensions for the future, calculating the duration of the pension at fifteen years only, after deducting the 5 per cent. allowed for restoration, &c., was $6,045,089.46.

While I do not believe it possible to eliminate from the pension-rolls all the fraudulent claims by any manner of means, yet, considering the whole case, it is my opinion that not less than 10 per cent. of the pensions appropriations are paid out upon fraudulent and illegal claims, which, by the adoption of a proper method for the preparation and presentation of the evidence in support of the cases, would be saved to the Government and the people.

He suggested, as I understand it, the bill introduced by the Senator from Virginia; he urged upon Congress the necessity of a public examination where a physician and an attorney should publicly examine the applicants and furnish the facts. Cases were reported to us, indeed I have been told of them, where men draw pensions because their hands are cut off that were taken off long after the war; cases are reported where men were without arms who lost them in disreputable ways outside of the Army and not connected with it are drawing pensions. So-called widows of soldiers have been married for years and are still drawing pensions as widows; in short, where two liars can be found in the slums of New York or anywhere else to swear them through a pension can be had and the Commissioner cannot prevent it; the pension agents at Washington, who are making fortunes out of this business, can get their share of the plunder, and they are the men, as Senators have stated on this floor, who have sent out all the petitions to be signed protesting against any public examination. And yet the Senate seems determined that it will allow no public investigation; it will pile up $200,000 more to employ clerks and to rent additional buildings, to hurry up all the claims, and thus push them through as rapidly as possible, and make it impossible to detect frauds by giving time for investigation. Why, sir, look at the list filed in the report of the Commissioner.

In the year 1872 there were only 8,857 applications filed for invalid pensions and 6,755 for widows. In the year 1880, after we had passed the arrears-of-pensions bill giving each man a thousand dollars or more—the exact sum I do not know—110,673 invalid claims were filed, seven years after 1872, and it is fair to assume that in 1872 there would be more men filing claims than in 1880, and from widows there were 6,427 claims filed in 1873, and in 1880 25,602, stimulated of course to present any claim and to suborn any witness who would put it through on ex parte statements without either a public examination before a competent examiner or before counsel for the United States to take care of our interests. The present system is where the Commissioner says, and says truly, the great evil is. He is asking for no more help in his office; he is asking for more efficient means of detecting fraud. Ten per cent. on $510,000,000, which he says will have to be paid on arrears of pensions alone, is $51,000,000 wrung from the tax-payers of this country to pay fraudulent claims made out by ex parte statements, the truth of which no official knows anything about, and as to which the Commissioner has no power to inquire, and all the clerks you add will not help him.

That is the way the Senate is now expected to push through this bill. I did not expect to say a word about it, because I am not familiar with all its details; but what we need now is laws and regulations, not to hurry through fraudulent claims, not to push through the demands of pension agents who have worked up on ex parte statements the cases to 110,000 that they have filed of invalids, and to 25,000 those of widows, that they have worked up in this year, when the amount of money received is an inducement, as against the 8,000 invalids and the 6,000 widows seven years ago, when there was no such inducement. If they waited till 1880 to file claims, that fact alone is suspicious. The object ought not to be to add $200,000 to hurry them through before investigation can be had, but to ascertain some fair, honest, careful way whereby the United States can be protected against fraudulent claims and whereby the honest pensioner can get every dollar he is entitled to. Those who have waited so long ought to be made to wait till every fact is fully considered.

Whether the law was good or bad, giving arrears of pensions, (I think it was a bad law,) I am sure it demoralized more soldiers than it benefited; it broke up the soldiers' homes, and much of the money has gone into the hands of men who speculated on the misfortunes of the soldiers. But be that as it may, the law allows it, and genuine soldiers ought to have it; but no honest man among them will object to having a thorough investigation made, whether pensioners are cited to show cause why the pension should not be taken away or whether they are cited to show cause why the United States should continue to pay them. The nearest neighbors of many of these men—so says the Commissioner of Pensions—would be surprised if they were to learn that pensions were being paid to people to whom they are paid.

It may be that the present Commissioner does not use the machinery now in his hands as efficiently as he ought. I do not know about that. He is evidently an industrious, bold, hard-working man. I sometimes think that instead of being commander-in-chief he is doing all the duty from corporal up; that he is taking too much on his own shoulders instead of making other people do it. I would select some man like General Wright, now at the head of the Engineer Corps; some man like General Walker, now at the head of the Census Bureau; some man who had not only the ability but the will and the courage to make every subordinate do his duty, and I would pay him $10,000 a year to see to it that every man he sent out to detect frauds went to the bottom of every suspected case in every congressional district. I would furnish each agent with a list in every district and every county. I would call in the postmasters and the revenue officers and officers of the courts everywhere to give an account of all these people; to tell who married, who died, what children were of age, who were fraudulent, who were honest, and I would spend, if necessary, to stop the payment of one million of fraudulent claims $2,000,000 or any amount required to prevent one million from being stolen. I do not mean to stand upon the amount of money necessary to have the laws enforced; what I desire is to stop stealing and pay salaries sufficient to get the men who can stop it. If Mr. Bentley, the present Commissioner, cannot there are men who can, and I would pay them well to do it. If necessary detach the Pension Office from the Interior Department altogether; make it a separate organization; make its head the master of the situation.

The Senator from Illinois, who knows so much about this—much more than I do—if the bill presented by the Senator from Virginia is not good, and if that presented by the Senator from Pennsylvania is not good, can, in my judgment, suggest the means whereby some efficient man whom he can name, if paid salary enough, with a corps of efficient men, can stop nine-tenths of the corruption going on now, and I hope the Military Committee or the Pensions Committee, or some committee that knows how to do it will do it, and do it at once. All I say is that the present amendment will do no good; it will only facilitate fraud.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Did I understand the Senator to say that the report of the Commissioner admitted that 10 per cent. of the claims now paid were fraudulent?

Mr. BECK. I will read in a few lines the language of Commissioner Bentley as contained in a communication addressed to Mr. DAVIS, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, dated January 20, 1881:

> While I do not believe it possible to eliminate from the pension-rolls all the fraudulent claims by any manner of means, yet, considering the whole case, it is my opinion that not less than 10 per cent. of the pensions appropriations are paid out upon fraudulent and illegal claims, which, by the adoption of a proper method for the preparation and presentation of the evidence in support of the cases, would be saved to the Government and the people.

That is the language of the Commissioner.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I supposed this discussion was over and I do not wish to continue it, but I cannot sit quietly in my seat and listen to the statements which are made without giving my opinion in reference to them. That same statement that in the opinion of the Commissioner of Pensions 10 per cent. of the money paid out was paid out on fraudulent claims has been made over and over again in the Senate Chamber. I said only a few days ago, and I repeat now, that until the Commissioner of Pensions or somebody else can give us the data upon which he formed his judgment about the frauds that are committed on the Pension Office, I must disregard that statement. That was one of the objections I made to the statement of the Commissioner of Pensions a few days ago, that it was only his opinion. Think of a man throwing out his opinions before the country in order to stigmatize pensioners as receiving money fraudulently! And the Senator from Kentucky said whenever you found two liars, a pension claim could be made out.

Mr. BECK. I did not mean to refer to Senators. I referred to men assuming to be entitled to pensions who were not; and if they would claim pensions when not entitled they would get men to swear to lies to enable them to get pensions.

Mr. LOGAN. The suggestion was that wherever there were two liars, that is two persons who would swear falsely, a case could be made out.

Mr. BECK. That is it.

Mr. LOGAN. Does not the Senator from Kentucky know that wherever a man claims a pension because his hand is off, because he has lost his arm, or lost a leg in battle, the records in the War Department are relied on to show that fact? And will he state it to go to the country that men can obtain pensions for the loss of legs or arms in this country by getting two false witnesses to swear falsely to the requisite facts. It is exactly these statements that I protest against, because they are not made upon anything that is correct. Will the Senator from Kentucky state that he knows of any person drawing a pension to-day on account of the loss of an arm or a hand or a leg who lost it after the war was over? I ask the Senator if he knows that fact? He said such cases came before the committee. Does he know the fact that persons are drawing pensions who lost a leg or an arm after the war was over, not in battle but in some disreputable place?

Mr. BECK. I know it as well as I know many a thing. I never saw it; but from the information of men who know all about it and have given names, I know it. In the city of Louisville it is common talk among the policemen that the agents never discover such cases, and they name the men and where they are. I am not a detective, nor do I know these facts myself.

Mr. LOGAN. If it be true that there are men drawing pensions for the loss of an arm or a leg who lost it in a disreputable way after the war was over, it only sustains what I said, that a new Commissioner with the old law is better than the old Commissioner with a new law. It only proves that there is a want of capacity to administer the law as it now exists. I must say to the Senator from Kentucky, not wishing to dispute anything he says, that I do not believe any such case exists. It may exist, but I should have to have evidence of it before I would believe it, because I know that a pensioner obtaining a pension for a wound received in battle or in the line of his duty must have record evidence of that fact. No two false witnesses can obtain a pension for a man; that is entirely a misjudgment of the law. The law is this: where any fact cannot be proven by the record in reference to the contraction of the disease, either the officer of the command in which the soldier served or two of his comrades who were acquainted with the fact when it occurred must swear to the fact. That is the law; so that a man cannot get a pension by obtaining false witnesses in the slums and sloughs of New York. He must get it by the oaths of his comrades to sustain the record. Where the record fails it must be on testimony by his officer or his comrades. The only instance where outsiders testify is to the disease continuing. His neighbors may testify to that; his family physician may testify to that; but when it comes to the fact on which the pension is based, it must be on the records of his country or by the testimony of his comrades. A better examination of the law by Senators perhaps would give them a little more information in reference to the question.

Now, sir, a word in reference to the alleged frauds. The Commissioner of Pensions shows in his report that he had $40,000 given him to detect frauds, and he says he has only used $26,000 of it. Whose fault is it, then? He has a right to detail one hundred and fifty special agents, if he chooses all his office, to examine and detect frauds, and the money has been appropriated for that purpose; and yet Senators stand on this floor and denounce poor, unfortunate men as being frauds or adopting fraudulent practices in obtaining money from the Government with all the means at hand to detect them and they are not detected. That only proves what I said before.

As I said, the machinery of this Government as it now exists is ample. All you want is to put it in force and put a man there who will organize your department, will separate the claims and the evidence as brought in, and pass upon the cases at once; then take up those which have been laid over and examine them.

If the Senator from Kentucky were in charge of the Pension Office, or if I were in charge of it, my judgment is that when we examined a case and said to the claimant that he should procure further evidence we would not say to him, you must procure evidence on this one point, but on every point in the case; we would say to him, you want evidence on this point, on this second point, on this third point, on this fourth point, and so let him cover all at once if he could honestly do so. But when your Commissioner of Pensions calls attention to one point, and when the pensioner covers that, then he calls his attention to another point, he covers that, and then he calls his attention to another point, he covers that, and then he calls his attention to another point, and he covers that, taking from one month to two months to get the testimony on each point, and in that manner delays the applicant.

That is one of the reasons why your law is not executed and your pensioners are complaining. It is because of these delays that are brought about by the officers themselves, and by the men who examine these cases, by not stating the whole thing and letting the pensioner have a chance to examine it all and state the entire facts. I state what I know about it. I have letters now in my possession which show that four or five different points in a case have been examined, one at a time; when one was made sufficient, then another would be suggested. No business man would do that; no man who wanted to facilitate the examination of these pension claims would do that; but that is exactly the way it is managed, and that is the reason of your delay and the reason why you complain. Many men complain merely of the method of the Commissioner of Pensions, who desires to get up some kind of machinery outside of the present law; and that machinery not going fully into operation at once, perhaps when the new administration comes in the necessity will arise for the same machinery with the same engineer to put it in operation. Now, I want no such thing. I want the pensioners to have a fair chance under the law as it now exists, and if they have that they have no right to complain, and if your Commissioner will administer it you will have no right to complain, or I. It is because the law is not administered as it ought to be administered that complaint arises. It is not the fault of the law, but the fault of the administration of the law.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, this matter has been discussed at very great length, and it seems to be understood that the whole discussion is irrelevant, because out of order. I should like, however, to participate for a moment in the discussion so far as to say that the remarks of the honorable Senator who has just taken his seat on the last point covered by those remarks I think do serious injustice to the Pension Office. I have had some little business communication with that office. I know that the course of proof is in the first place when the application is filed for the bureau to call upon the applicant for evidence in respect of the various points necessary to be maintained in order to establish the claim for a pension; those points are all specified, and he is called upon for the evidence to sustain them. When that evidence returns to the office it very seldom, on account of various informalities, is satisfactory proof of the various points to be established; and thereupon the office restates, so far as necessary, what is established; if one point is proven it is stated; if another is not proven the applicant is called on for further evidence to establish that point; and it is not at all strange that before all these points are finally examined a large and extended correspondence should take place.

There is much that might be said of the merits of the bill which has been ruled out of order and upon which I had, if it were ruled in order, desired to be heard. I think it was a good bill, provided it had been substantially amended in many respects. It was only a partial thing as it stood, and would, I believe, have operated unfavorably in practice as it then was, and yet it did strike at the real difficulty in the Pension Office, which is not the lack of testimony—Heaven knows there is enough there now. The difficulty is they have too much testimony, and they are not able to believe it; they have more than they want, such as it is, and the effort of the bureau is to devise some way in which they can obtain reliable testimony bearing on the cases which are there pending. That cannot be done here by an accumulation of a greater amount of precisely the same testimony, subject to precisely the same objections as that which they already have; and this testimony, taken with such formality and subject to so many reasons of suspicion in so many cases as experience has demonstrated, has produced all through that office a chronic state of suspicion so that no man goes into that office with a fair chance. I have known instances in my little connection with that office where a case being proved overwhelmingly, it seemed to be rejected for the very reason that there was sufficient proof, and the next case would be rejected for the very reason that there was none, and so the applicant is between the devil and the deep sea. If he proves his case they reject it because they say it is not possible to get so full and complete evidence to establish the case as the man has here; it is almost unknown in practice; there is too much of it; it is too good a case, and they are suspicious of it for that very reason, or at least they seem to be. On the other hand, if a man is only able to produce a part of the testimony, and that may be very honest and reliable testimony, the case is rejected on that account. So it goes.

Here I feel bound to say that I believe the Commissioner of Pensions is a true, honest, and capable gentleman, and that he has devoted himself to the discharge of the duties of that important and difficult office with an assiduity and with an ability worthy of all praise, and it will be a fortunate administration that is able to appoint as able a successor as he is himself. But let that pass.

The Pension Office is, in my belief, to-day unfit to consider evidence. It is simply an organized suspicion, and if I had control of that office I would abolish very largely its personnel, and I would put in there men who were capable of understanding and weighing evidence, and who were capable of coming to a conviction after they had perused it and examined it, which seems to be the difficulty with the men now there. But there they are; there is the Pension Office with three hundred and fifty or four hundred men who are engaged in the practical administration of the pension law, and there they are likely to be. We are not going to abolish it. We have just taken action which practically precludes Congress from doing anything at the present session to remedy the great evils under which the applicants for pensions are now suffering. I see nothing that we are likely to do excepting to add to the evil, though a little good does come from it, by appropriating the $200,000 which the Senator from Kansas proposes to give. I think it had better be given. It will be largely wasted; it will develop to a still greater extent existing evils; but at the same time it will result in the allowance of a few claims. The evil has become so outrageous, so wicked, the wrong and oppression which this great nation is exercising upon those who have shed their blood in its defense and to whose sacrifices it owes its present existence are so great, that I will seize any opportunity of affording even the slightest relief. The only thing we are likely to do at the present session is simply to give a little more money, to be practically wasted, as very much of that has been which has been given in the past.

Therefore I support this amendment. It will do some good. It is half enough to carry into practical operation the bill proposed by the Committee on Pensions, for I believe it would pay two hundred of the proposed examiners, and pretty much all these cases are within the limits of two hundred congressional districts of the country. But however that may be, it is too late. The money had better be given to add to the efficiency of the bureau for the present session, and I do hope that by some future Congress the evil may be taken hold of in a statesmanlike way, and that some means may be devised to obtain something which will command the conviction of the human mind, which will secure to the claimant an honest and an impartial tribunal. I think the very bill which has been rejected might have been amended by a word in a way to do away with one great evil that exists. Suppose the pension examiners, which it was proposed to appoint, had been made judges of the fact as well as simply commissioners to take the testimony. The bill contemplated that they should be men trained in the law; men accustomed to the consideration of evidence; who could weigh it, who could consider it, draw conclusions from it; men like masters in chancery, commissioners to pass upon questions of fact. If in addition to the function of taking evidence these men had been charged with the duty of passing an opinion upon the force of that evidence, and should be required to make their report to the Department at Washington with their findings of the facts, and that finding should have been made prima facie evidence on which a pension should be granted—had that been done this difficulty would have been almost entirely obviated, and the idea of my honorable friend from Pennsylvania, of a court, would have been met. We should have had the advantage of a man living in the locality, acquainted with the people throughout the district, able to judge whether it was probable those who appeared before him told the truth, and he would have the great advantage of personal inspection of the witnesses who testified, and he would be able more than any other man, however capable that other might be, to render an honest and correct decision upon the evidence before him; and that would have relieved the Department at Washington.

What are they doing at the Pension Office? Undertaking with testimony which they do not believe in, to be sure, but theoretically undertaking to pass upon these questions of fact upon the evidence before them. That is what they are undertaking to do; that is their business. If this were devolved upon an examiner living in the locality of the pensioner, it would not require to be done here, and the force in the Pension Office could be very largely discharged; it could be lessened by at least the number of examiners to be appointed throughout the country, so that the expense being reduced here the total expense of the administration of the pension laws would be very slightly, if at all, increased. A few other modifications might have been made in that bill, which would in effect have removed every objection which has been urged against it.

I pay but very little attention to these allegations of fraud. I sympathize with the views of the honorable Senator from Illinois in that regard. There are some frauds, to be sure; but the administration of law generally throughout the country, in my belief, is attended with very much greater frauds than are committed in the Pension Office to-day. There may be some. I am willing that the country should bleed a little in that direction rather than that the honest claims of so vast a number of pensioners should go unheard and unsatisfied. There are substantially 300,000 of these claims now pending; they are coming at the rate of from eighteen to twenty thousand a year; they are coming in on the Pension Office faster than they are being disposed of. There are nearly two thousand of these claims in every district of the United States which has any considerable number at all.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the statement so often made that there are 300,000 pension claims now pending, and I have been on one or two occasions compelled to correct it. The report shows 300,000, but that includes all the claims that were rejected. There are over 80,000 claims rejected. There are but little over 200,000 claims pending now and not examined.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator, however, is aware of the fact that not one of those rejected claims is finally disposed of; every one of them is liable to be called up at any time, and when one of those cases is called up it necessarily requires a lengthy investigation, and absorbs very much more time than an ordinary claim.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely wish to get the fact to the country that of the 300,000 claims said to be now pending and waiting examination over 80,000 have been examined and rejected. That is the fact.

Mr. BLAIR. Yes, they have been rejected, and universally almost to the dissatisfaction of the applicant; and as long as he lives, believing in his claim, he will try to make an effort to have it allowed. I do not think the Commissioner of Pensions can be charged with an effort to mislead the country in stating the number as he does at 280,000 and coming in continually at the rate of from 1,800 to 2,000 per month. I think that is the truth in regard to it, and I think that under the existing law or the administration of the law we shall not gain on the pension applications for five or ten years to come; the applications will gain on us, and some method will have to be devised in order that they may be disposed of.

Now permit me to say a word in regard to the justice of that bill providing for the payment of arrears of pensions to those whose names are already on the roll. I believe that bill was one of the most just and honorable bills ever enacted by Congress. What was the nature of it? We took the pensioner whose name was upon the roll, who it may be after years of effort had been able to establish the honesty and justice of his claim; we had passed upon it; we had rendered judgment upon it; and the Government was estopped to say that it was paying that pension fraudulently or wrongfully. Other men had applied seasonably and they had drawn pensions from the date of disease or of disability or of the death of the person on whose account the pension was paid; their pensions were from the date of discharge, of disability, or of death all the way down. The Government of the United States, when it provided for the payment of arrears to those who made their applications much later in life, simply gave them not the aggregation of the installments as they would have been paid, but simply the installments themselves, and the United States gained more by the delay of the applicants, considerably more in very many instances by the use of these installments in the nature of reserved interest, than the pensioner himself received. So it does not lie in the mouth of the United States to say that the pensioner was at fault for having delayed his application or that by reason of his having failed to file his claim it should be considered as less meritorious or less just. It is not the case where when a man's claim has not been established and proved when presented he is allowed subsequently to be paid back to the beginning. By no manner of means, but we pay the man who has fought his way through to the allowance of his claim arrears from the beginning, and the gain is wholly on the side of the country by virtue of this delay.

But, sir, I am aware, as I said in the beginning, that this is all out of order; still, as much is being said in the way of suggestion with reference to the possible framing of some bill which may be a remedy for this evil in the future, I felt at liberty to make these, as I should like if time permitted to make other suggestions.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I have taken no part in the discussion of this question, and do not think it proper to occupy the time of the Senate with any views in regard to it after the matter has been so thoroughly debated as it has been; but I cannot suffer the pending amendment to become incorporated in this bill without at least expressing my opposition to it.

This is the first instance in the history of the country, so far as I know, where there has been any disposition on the part of the Senate or of either House of Congress to force on any Department of this Government or any bureau of this Government assistance in the way of additional clerks or examiners, that has not been requested or the necessity for which has not in some way been suggested by the Department or bureau itself.

The Government has various heads of Departments and heads of bureaus who have charge of the matters pertaining to their own particular stations, and in the past history of the country there has not been too much hesitation on the part of any of these heads of Departments or heads of bureaus in making known to Congress at any time when they needed additional clerks or additional force of any character.

It is to be presumed that if additional force in the way of clerks or examiners was necessary in the Pension Bureau, the officer who has been referred to frequently in this debate, commended by some and censured by others, would have come to Congress and made known to them the wants of the bureau over which he presides. But an anomaly has occurred in the history of the legislation of the country. In the Senate of the United States the grave proposition is made to add clerks and employés to one of the Departments of this Government, at a cost of $200,000 annually, for which they have not asked and perhaps for which they will not thank you.

I rose simply to emphasize this anomaly in the history of our legislation. It is gravely proposed in the Senate of the United States, without even consulting the Commissioner of Pensions, to thrust upon him, not knowing that he has a single desk at which he can place an employé, an examiner, or a clerk, $200,000 more for assistance to enable him to perform the duties of the office. We ought to hesitate, even if it was desired by the Commissioner of Pensions; we ought to examine into the necessity of it, to see whether he could utilize such a force properly, whether the expenditure would be a proper expenditure or not; but instead of doing that we come here without his leave or license and compel him to accept the services of clerks and examiners that will cost $200,000.

This much I desired to say upon the particular amendment now pending before the Senate. In reference to the general question of frauds on the pension-roll, that is a matter of which I have no personal knowledge and therefore of which I cannot speak from any knowledge of my own; but I had the honor when I first came into the Senate, nearly ten years ago, of being placed upon the Committee on Pensions, and I served upon that committee, I think faithfully, for two years. I know that at that time, in 1872 and 1873, it was alleged that the then Commissioner of Pensions—whether he did make that allegation or not I do not know—estimated that the frauds upon the pension fund amounted to nearly 20 per cent. I do not know that these frauds exist, neither do I know that the then Commissioner of Pensions so averred, but I believe that every Commissioner of Pensions from that time to this, so far as I have heard, has expressed his opinion that there were frauds committed on the pension fund and that there were pensioners now on the pension-rolls drawing pensions who had no right to be there. A late Secretary of the Interior, I believe, stated on the floor of the Senate that his experience connected with the Interior Department had satisfied him that gross frauds had been committed upon the pension fund and that many persons were placed upon the pension-roll who were not entitled to be there.

Now, it is not surprising that this should be the case. The Senator from Illinois a few moments ago said that Senators ought not to make such allegations without any data. I suppose he meant without assigning any reasons for the opinion entertained. We all know who have served on the Pensions Committee, as the Senator from Illinois has, how claims are established before the committees of Congress and how they are established also before the Commissioner of Pensions. Many facts are proved by the ex parte statements of individuals subject to no cross-examination; and every man who has practiced law to any extent knows that many a time parties would come into court and testify so as to make out their own case did they not know that they would be cross-examined on the very facts necessary to establish their case. Yet on these facts established by ex parte testimony there is no cross-examination. If the witness is a man of character, this may not be so important; but if he is not a man of character, if he is regardless of the oath he has taken, there is no certainty that the affidavit which he makes is verity itself.

I believe that one of the greatest duties devolving on Congress at the present time is to devise some mode by which not only the pending claims can be examined but by which the entire pension roll can undergo a thorough investigation. Many of the men who are now drawing pensions have been placed upon the roll on affidavits that were deemed conclusive, but which on a revision of the whole subject may be proved not to have been correct.

I shall cheerfully vote for any proper bill that looks to the thorough revision of the pension roll. I would deprive no man entitled under the laws of the land to a pension, of that which has been awarded him; nor can any man who is on the pension roll rightfully, whose claim is a valid one, object to the examination of his case, as well as of every other man's case, in order to purge the pension roll of any fraud that exists, and it would be a public service performed to the honest pensioner himself, and it might protect the Government against this great and enormous fraud which has been alleged to exist, amounting, as the Senator from Kentucky, under the statements of the Commissioner of Pensions, said, to 10 per cent., and amounting in the arrears of pensions alone to more than $50,000,000, if that statement is correct. As to its correctness I cannot say. But when men charged with the performance of the duties of Pensions Commissioner report to Congress that such is the fact, I ask, does it not become an imperative duty of every Senator to give the subject that examination which will enable him to ascertain the truth or falsity of the statements made by the Commissioner of Pensions himself?

Now, in reference to the arrears-of-pensions act, I have heard that act lauded to the skies. I have no censure against the gentlemen who voted for the act, but I regard the vote which I gave on that subject in opposition to the law which gave arrears of pensions as one of the best votes I have given in my ten years' service in this body. The soldiers themselves were not clamoring for arrears of pension. The whole scheme was worked up by the pension agents. They were the men who got up the cry of arrears of pension. The pensioners as a general rule were satisfied with the bounty of the Government, but the men who were making money as pension agents tried to create a cry throughout the country in favor of that bill. I think it was a very unfortunate act. Doubtless it has put money into the hands of many men, but it was a gratuity, not a debt, as has been asserted in this debate. The pensioner was already receiving all that the Government promised him, all that he was entitled to under the existing law; but in our magnanimity, inspired by patriotism perhaps—I shall not attribute any other motive to the act—we in our magnanimity conferred a gratuity upon men who were already receiving all that they were entitled to under the laws of the country, a gratuity which amounts, according to statements that are made, to not less than $500,000,000. I recorded my vote against that bill, and I am proud that it is upon record. In my place in the Senate I gave my vote against it.

I did not intend, Mr. President, to occupy this much time in the discussion of the subject. I know how futile it is to oppose any measure which seeks to promote, directly or indirectly, the interests of men claiming the bounty of the Government as soldiers; but I simply desired to enter my protest against the pending amendment which proposes to place employés in the shape of clerks and examiners in the Pension Office for which neither the Commissioner of Pensions nor any other officer of the Government has ever made a request.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Have we not heard statements that there are at least two hundred thousand cases pending there undisposed of? Does not the accumulation, in point of fact, of this large number of applications sufficiently indicate to Congress the necessity for an additional force?

Mr. SAULSBURY. The report of the Commissioner of Pensions discloses the fact that our action in granting arrears of pensions has multiplied fivefold, I believe, the applications for pensions in the last twelve months; but it discloses this further fact that, with the force at his command now, he has examined some 20,000 claims more than any other Commissioner has examined in the same length of time. He has examined, I believe, 55,000 or 56,000 claims in the last year, some 20,000 more than ever were examined in twelve months by any Commissioner but him. So while his report does disclose the fact that there is a great accumulation, it gives us the cause of that accumulation, the arrears-of-pensions act which has caused every man who could possibly conceive that he had a right to the vast sum of money given to the soldier, to make application; but while he has disclosed that fact, he has also disclosed that there has been an assiduity on the part of the Pension Office that is praiseworthy, because he shows the fact that he has examined a much larger number of claims than were ever examined before in the same period of time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.]

Mr. TELLER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. BOOTH. Mr. President, I only desire to say one word. I should have preferred that there could have been some substantial amendment to the method of administration in the Pension Office, but that has been decided to be out of order. I should greatly have preferred that this amendment should be made to the legislative, executive, and judicial bill where it could have been considered by the committee under advice from the department, but the Senate has decided that the amendment is in order upon this bill, and believing that some legislation is necessary in order to expedite the business of the office, I am constrained to vote for the amendment.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask that the amendment be read.

The CHIEF CLERK At the end of line 17 it is proposed to insert:

To provide fifty additional examiners and for rent for additional rooms or buildings therefor for the Pension Office, and the number of clerks for the Pension Office and Adjutant-General's and Surgeon-General's Offices, respectively, necessary to render effective the work of said examiners, the sum of $200,000, to be immediately available.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WINDOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from West Virgina, [Mr. DAVIS.] If he were present I should vote "yea." I presume he would vote "nay," and therefore I withhold my vote.

The roll-call was then concluded; and the result was announced—yeas 39, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—39.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to amend by adding as an additional section to the bill:

The provisions of section 2 of chapter 187, third session Forty-fifth Congress, approved March 3, 1879, be, and is hereby, so amended as to extend the limitations therein stated to the 1st day of July, 1883.

The proviso of the section referred to in this amendment is in these words:

Provided, The application for such pension has been or is hereafter filed with the Commissioner of Pensions prior to the 1st day July, 1880, otherwise the pension shall commence from the date of filing the application.

The effect of my amendment is to extend the right of filing claims, so as to carry with them arrears, until the 1st of July, 1883.

Mr. BOOTH. Upon that amendment I raise the question of order. It is legislation upon a general appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas offers the amendment which has been read. The Senator from California raises the question of order whether it is in order, being general legislation upon an appropriation bill. That question the Chair will submit to the Senate. Is the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas in order?

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask the Chair to cause to be read the provision in the bill, to which this is an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This is a new section.

Mr. CONKLING. But what is the subject-matter of the bill to which the amendment is supposed to relate? What does it follow in the bill?

The CHIEF CLERK. The second section of the bill is in these words:

All pensions payable, or to be paid under this act, to pensioners who are inmates of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers shall be paid to the treasurer or treasurers of said home, to be disbursed for the benefit of the pensioners under regulations to be established by the managers of the home; said payment to be made by the pension agent upon a certificate of the proper officer of the home that the pensioner is an inmate thereof and is still living. Any balance of the pension which may remain at the date of the pensioner's discharge shall be paid over to him; and in case of his death at the home, the same shall be paid to the widow or minor children under sixteen years of age, if any there be: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent an absolute assignment of his pension by a pensioner having neither wife, child, nor parent dependent upon him, as now provided by law.

It is proposed to add:

SEC. 3. The provisions of section 2 of chapter 187, third session Forty-fifth Congress, approved March 3, 1879, be and is hereby so amended as to extend the limitations therein stated to the 1st day of July, 1883.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is this amendment in order? Those Senators who believe it is will say "ay;" those opposed will say "no," [putting the question.] The noes have it, and the amendment is decided not to be in order.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. INGALLS. I wish to reserve for a separate vote in the Senate the amendment that I offered striking out the provision relative to the payment of Indian pensioners in installments, and also the vote by which section 2 of the amendments offered by the Committee on Appropriations was agreed to in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas reserves the amendments indicated.

Mr. BECK. I ask for a separate vote on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] giving $200,000 for clerks not desired by the Department.

Mr. ALLISON. Is that the language of the amendment?

Mr. BECK. I want a vote on that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be reserved. How will the Senate act on the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. HARRIS. Let us vote on all except those reserved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All the amendments not excepted or reserved will be submitted to the Senate in gross. Will the Senate agree to the amendments which have been adopted as in Committee of the Whole, and which have not been reserved for separate votes?

The question being put, it was determined in the affirmative.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question will now be upon the amendments reserved by the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.]

Mr. INGALLS. My object in reserving section 2 and asking for a separate vote on that was for the purpose of calling attention to the proviso, which is in the following language:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent an absolute assignment of his pension by a pensioner having neither wife, child, nor parent dependent upon him, as now provided by law.

The fact is that such an assignment is not "now provided by law." It has always been regarded with special disfavor by law as opening the broadest possible of all avenues to the perpetration of fraud upon the Pension Department. I therefore move to strike out from the second section of the bill as agreed to in Committee of the Whole the proviso contained in lines 13, 14, 15, and 16 in the words that I have read.

Mr. BOOTH. I hope the motion will be adopted. On an examination of the law such as I have been able to make since the bill was reported I can find no such provision of law, and I think there is no necessity for the language. It leaves a doubt on a point which ought to be clear.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas to amend the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senate, in Committee of the Whole, by a vote of 25 to 25, declined to agree to an amendment I offered to strike out the following words in lines 24, 25, and 26:

And accrued pension due the Indian pensioners shall, in the discretion of the Commissioner of Pensions, be paid in installments.

I stated before the committee that in the Indian country, among the civilized Indian nations, a brigade of three regiments was raised, officered by men of their own blood, that rendered distinguished services to the Union cause throughout the war under a Union general. These men fought for the country; they were wounded in its defense and have by due process of law been declared to be entitled to pensions. We have for several days been engaged in discussing how we shall make the Indians self-supporting and how we shall endue them with the rights of manhood. I submit again to the Senate that if we persist in treating civilized Indians as children, as non compos mentis and in putting them under guardianship, we shall certainly make no progress in the direction that has been indicated as desireable heretofore under the bills that have been pending.

I submit again to the sense of justice of the Senate, for which every place has been declared to be a temple and every season summer, whether this restriction shall not be removed, and whether these men having shown themselves to be entitled to pension shall not receive it like every other dependent upon the bounty of the Government. I ask again for a vote upon this amendment, and I ask the Senate to concur with me in saying that these men who have been declared to be entitled to pension shall receive their pension and not be placed under the guardianship of the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of Pensions and have the sum awarded to them dealt out in driblets as he may see fit in his discretion to dispose of it to them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas moves to strike out the sentence beginning in line 24 and ending with line 26. The question is on this amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next reserved amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 17, after the word "dollars," the Committee of the Whole inserted:

To provide fifty additional examiners, and for rent for additional rooms in buildings therefor, for the Pension Office, and the number of clerks for the Pension Office and Adjutant-General's and Surgeon-General's Offices, respectively, necessary to render effective the work of said examiners, the sum of $200,000, to be immediately available.

Mr. WITHERS. I wish to say one word, though I had determined not to say anything more. It is evident that the views of the Committee on Appropriations have no weight with the Senate whatever, and the opinion of an individual member of the Senate is made to outweigh the opinion and recommendation of the head of a Department and of the Commissioner of Pensions. I would merely call attention to the very anomalous procedure, as I conceive it to be, when a single Senator, on his own judgment of what is necessary and right, gets up in the Senate and moves to increase the clerical force in one of the Departments to an indefinite amount, fifty examiners with a large force of clerks in that Department, such force not being specified, when we had the assurance of the Commissioner of Pensions and the Secretary of the Interior that the increase of the clerical force made in that office a year ago was as much as could be utilized, and that no additional increase of force could add anything to the promptitude with which pension claims could be considered and determined.

I wanted to call attention also to the fact that the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill is the one upon which uniformly it has been the practice of the Senate to ingraft such amendments as the one now presented for consideration, when in the judgment of the Senate they were necessary. They have never been put on the pension bill proper, nor the other regular appropriation bills; but the legislative, executive, and judicial bill is so capacious as to provide for any regulations that may be required with regard to the clerical force of the various Departments, and I can conceive of no just or good reasons why this should be made an exception and attached to this bill without giving an opportunity to those who have control of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill to ascertain the facts in the case and determine if in their judgment the increase is likely to be effective; because if it be not, and my information is that it will not be, it will simply be an addition of $200,000 or $300,000 for the expense of two or three or four hundred additional clerks, without any probability that we shall have any more pension cases determined than if the present force is allowed to remain as it is. There is ample time before the passage of the legislative bill to ascertain these facts. If it shall be established here that it will increase at all the efficiency of that department or facilitate the decision of pension cases, I will go as far as the farthest, as I have done in the past, in voting whatever increase may be necessary to secure the largest possible clerical force which will secure the prompt decision and adjudication of the vast arrears of cases now pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I rise to obtain some information in regard to this amendment which appropriates $200,000. As I understand it, the money is to be expended by different Secretaries, by different Departments. I do not see exactly how it is going to be divided. Part goes to the War Department and part to the Interior. Who is to be the umpire in the matter? I may be ignorant on that subject, but I do not see myself how it can be divided. I should be glad to have the amendment read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I submit that that is rather a crude amendment. In its present form I think it will breed difficulty. I voted for it because I thought some good might arise from it; but I do not see on further reflection that the amendment in its present shape is likely to prove beneficial. I think the mover of the amendment had better put it in some other shape, so that there will be no difficulty in the expenditure of the money.

Mr. PLUMB. In the first place I have great confidence that if we vote money for clerks there will be some way found for its expenditure.

Mr. BURNSIDE. If this money can be expended honestly and in accordance with law, let it be done; but the amendment should be put in proper shape.

Mr. PLUMB. If the suggestion of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. WITHERS] is of any weight, then of course there will not be any of this money spent, because he says the Commissioner is well satisfied that no additional force is necessary. If so, of course he will not spend the money, for it is utterly useless.

Mr. WITHERS. No, he would be certain to employ clerks if directed by act of Congress to do so.

Mr. PLUMB. I am not going to stand by the language of this amendment as one of those things which are as perfect as they can be made; but it seems to me on reflection to answer the purpose which is designed. It provides for fifty examiners. Fifty examiners require in order to make their labor effective certain other clerks to examine the records of the Surgeon-General's Office and the Adjutant-General's Office, and certain other clerks to manipulate the papers for their examination in the Pension Bureau. That is one of those things which I take it are not legislative questions; but it is an administrative question; it is a question which can be determined by the action of the Pension Bureau according to its experience from time to time. Circumstances existing to-day might require more of one class and less of another, and to-morrow they might require just the opposite. So I do not think there is anything in the way of the effective carrying out of this amendment.

Mr. WALLACE. One branch of service here provided for is under the War Department, and the other under the Interior Department.

Mr. PLUMB. That is the way the appropriation has been made. When we provided for carrying out the arrears-of-pensions act we made in one bill provision for force in all three of these departments, in the Surgeon-General's Office, in the Adjutant-General's Office, and in the Pension Bureau.

Mr. WITHERS. I would ask the Senator if any such provision has ever been incorporated in any pension bill?

Mr. PLUMB. Not in the same verbiage, but we did provide in one bill for the force in all these bureaus.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The same bill should not provide for the expenditure of the money by two Departments. I think it ought to be divided in some way. There should be some provision authorizing the Secretary of War to draw on the Treasury for a certain part of the money, and the Secretary of the Interior to draw for another proportion.

Mr. PLUMB. That is one of those things which can be adjusted in practice according to the needs of the service. More might be required in one Department and less in another. That is a thing which can be very well determined by the Pension Bureau by reason of its experience. There is no difficulty, as I conceive, in the way of carrying it out.

A word or two about the objection of the Senator from Virginia. He alleges that this will not result in the transaction of any more business. Is it conceivable that there is any machine so large in this Government that you cannot increase its efficiency by adding new force? The only foundation I have ever heard for an allegation of that kind as applied to the operations of the Pension Bureau is that there are only a certain number of rolls of regiments, of companies, and batteries, and headquarters, and so on, in which the men who are claiming pensions served, which can be the subject of examination in order to get the record data in regard to the service. But if the men who do this duty enter upon its discharge with the zeal they ought, they would find a great many ways of overcoming that difficulty.

As the Senator from Colorado well knows, out in his country a man who is capable of running a little mine employing ten men knows the great economy of time in running what are called two shifts; that is to say, two gangs of men succeeding each other, one commencing at seven o'clock in the morning and continuing until five in the afternoon, and the other commencing at five and continuing until three the next morning. But the ten-hour system does not prevail in the Departments of this Government; it is a six-hour system I think, and scant at that. I do not mean to say that those who do this work could labor the whole twenty-four hours of the day; I do say, however, that if there is a determination on the part of those who administer the pension laws to transact the business more rapidly, it will be very easy, so far as the force in the Adjutant-General's Office and the Surgeon-General's Office is concerned, to put on a relay of clerks at seven o'clock in the morning who shall work eight or ten hours, as the case may be, to be succeeded by another force of clerks who shall take up the labor where the first left it off and continue it during the evening.

Mr. EATON. That is poetry.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Connecticut suggests that this is poetry. I do not know but that this is getting out of the realm of poetry. This will be a tragedy of large proportions if something is not done pretty soon. I think that the determination of Congress, if it shall be expressed in the shape of this amendment or of any other, whereby additional service will be employed, will so operate on the Commissioner of Pensions and upon all the branches of that service as that these men will feel themselves called upon to give effect, not only to this law, but to stimulate in every way the operations necessary to determine the cases which have been so long pending.

I believe it is entirely competent for clerks to commence work at seven or eight in the morning and continue until a proper period in the afternoon and be succeeded by other clerks to take up the examination of these records. It is not an abstruse question, it is not a technical employment, it is one of those things which can be carried on by any person who can read. The question as to whether the name of a certain man was borne on the roll of a certain company or regiment, when he was mustered into the service, when his term expired, whether during that time he was reported to be in hospital, whether during any portion of that time he was reported as a deserter, and all the essential facts of the service, may be determined by any one who can read ordinary handwriting, and who with ordinary handwriting can put upon paper the result of that observation. There will be ways, plenty of ways that a willing Commissioner—no doubt we have such a one—will find to effectively spend this money. As my colleague showed to the Senate to-day in the report of the Commissioner there is a demand for more clerks, and I think if the Commissioner had not made up his mind that the Senate would adopt his view in regard to a system of courts which would supersede the present system, he would have been here asking for more clerks; but his whole effort, or a large part of it, has been directed to the obtaining of legislation he thought better adapted to the allowance of pensions than the present one and I think measurably to the neglect of the machinery necessary to effectively carry out what he now has.

Mr. BECK. Will the Secretary be kind enough to read the title of the bill now under consideration?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H. R. No. 6532) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882.

Mr. BECK. That is the object of the bill. The proposition now is to provide all the machinery not only necessary to carry that out, but also to supply the Adjutant-General's Office and the Surgeon-General's Office, and other branches of the War Department with additional machinery, and that the Senate has declared to be in order and a proper thing on this bill. So then, instead of being a bill to provide for pensions for the year ending June 30, 1882, it is to be converted into a bill to provide for all the machinery necessary for running two branches of the War Department, the Surgeon-General's Office and the Adjutant-General's Office, and all the matters that pertain to the general legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. It is the motion of an individual Senator without the recommendation of the head of a Department or any man in official authority.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I think the rules of the Senate are very clear on that question.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Florida must never forget that when a pension bill is up no rule prevails except to give all we can, for fear some soldier will go to the polls and vote against our party. That is the only rule. No Senator, or hardly any, dares to vote what is the truth and what is his own conviction of the truth, for fear that result will follow.

What I want to say is that if the heads of Departments and the Committee on Appropriations are not to be allowed to consider what is necessary as to the clerical force in the Surgeon-General's Office, in the Adjutant-General's Office, and in the Pension Office, and if everthing that any individual Senator sees fit to ask for is, out of order, to be put upon this bill, then you had better vote to dismiss your Committee on Appropriations, and say you have no longer any use for them.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I voted for this amendment a few moments ago in Committee of the Whole, but I desire to submit now to the Senator from Kansas, on more careful examination of the amendment, whether or not it will effectuate what he desires. It provides first for fifty examiners. Now, I can find no such title in any of the appropriation bills for clerks in the Pension Office. There are examiners there, I know, but they are designated I suppose by the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS. From the general roll of clerks?

Mr. ALLISON. I think these examiners, if they are to accomplish what the Senator desires, should be, at least, fourth-class clerks, and if we desire to make them such we should so designate them. It also provides that certain clerks shall be assigned the Surgeon-General's Office and the Adjutant-General's Office without defining the number or the pay of those clerks. The heads of those offices can employ, if they choose, fourth-class clerks or second or first class, or one-thousand-dollar clerks.

It seems to me that if we are to provide for this additional clerical force on this bill, we should make it more specific and more definite; and therefore, with all due deference to the Senator who has presented this amendment, I think it had better be passed over and go upon the regular bill providing for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government. I, for one, shall be ready to vote for the largest number and for the best compensation if we can by providing for this class of clerks secure the performance of this work.

I submit this to the Senator from Kansas. I think his amendment is entirely too indefinite.

Mr. WINDOM. I voted, or should have voted had I not been paired, for this amendment in Committee of the Whole; but, as has been stated by the Senator from Iowa, upon reflection I think it is not in the proper place. The Senator has given some very good reasons I think why it should not be placed here. The legislative appropriation bill will be before the Senate in a short time. The Committee on Appropriations will have ample opportunity before that bill comes before us for action to examine the question and call before it the Commissioner of Pensions and others and ascertain in what classes these clerks should be provided for. It seems to me the amendment would be in place upon that bill and that it is not in place upon this measure.

I shall therefore vote, assuming that the Senator with whom I am paired would vote as I shall, against the amendment in the Senate; and I join with the Senator from Iowa in saying that I shall vote for the largest number of clerks that may be necessary when the legislative appropriation bill comes up. I believe there ought to be an additional force, and I believe that an additional force can be used economically and to expedite the business of the Department; but I cannot vote for it on this bill. I made the statement a few moments ago without as much consideration as I have given it since, and I desire to vote against concurring in the amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to say simply that I concur fully in the views expressed by the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Minnesota. It is certainly not best to put the amendment on this bill. When the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill is before us we can place this amendment in its proper order, so as to make the force effective and make the appropriation which will then be granted efficient in accomplishing the ends desired. I fear it would not accomplish what we desire here.

I say very frankly that I am, and always have been and always shall be, in favor of voting adequate appropriations for every Department of the Government, in order to enable them promptly and efficiently to dispose of all the business that is pending before them. There is an accumulation of business in the Pension Office; it ought to be disposed of, and promptly and justly and fairly; and when the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill comes to the Senate I doubt not the Appropriations Committee, having before them the heads of the Departments and investigating the whole matter, will make such appropriations and such provisions as will accomplish what we all desire. I trust the amendment will not be concurred in.

Mr. PLUMB. It is a little strange that the Appropriations Committee should be so sensitive about what goes on an appropriation bill. I do not recall an appropriation bill that has passed the Senate since I have been here that has not had on it more or less legislation. This very bill has got on it an abundance of it just as obnoxious to what has been said about the propriety of this amendment as the amendment itself is.

So far as the objection of the Senator from Iowa is concerned that we do not say anything about the classes of clerks, let me call that Senator's attention to the fact that when we passed the census act we left the entire question of how many clerks should be appointed and their salaries to the Superintendent of the Census. He is employing to-day clerks, not by classes but picking them up according to the price at which he can obtain them, to do the work. There is no limitation at all. He can pay a man a thousand dollars a year or a thousand dollars a month, or he may stint him to a sum which will barely keep body and soul together. The discretion which is lodged by this amendment is not a new thing; and I do not think that this is the place nor the time nor the circumstance under which an objection of this kind should be raised.

It is true that if this amendment, or a similar one, were to be placed on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, it would answer the same purpose. It could not answer any better purpose. But here we are in the last days of the session. There is certain formal business yet to be done, which is going to occupy a great many days of it; there is a great deal of other business which is to come before the Senate, and in a few days we shall be in a maelstrom. The question as to what shall be done will be at the arbitrary will, not of the Senate, but perhaps of a committee; and more than that, the committee itself, as well as the Senate, will be prevented by reason of lack of time from doing many things it would like to do. The time will come when a man who rises here to debate a question, to offer an amendment to anything, will be regarded as a man to be put down; as a man who is doing something toward occasioning the necessity for an extra session of Congress. All debate, practically, will be cut off. We shall be doing business with double haste shortly, and a great many things will be put over that before the committee would say ought to be done.

There is no incongruity, there is no inappropriateness, in this amendment. We are providing here a large sum of money for the purpose of carrying out the pension law; and adding $200,000 for machinery whereby this money is to be expended, does not, I submit in view of all the circumstances of the case and what has preceded it, violate the proprieties in any degree.

Of course, if the committee itself was united and could agree that it would put an amendment of this kind upon the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, no matter who might say nay, that would be worth considering; but here are two members of the Appropriations Committee who express a conviction that this force ought to be increased, and here are two equally influential members who say the force ought not to be increased. What guarantee is there, then, that when this question comes to be considered on another bill it will receive any more favorable consideration than it receives now, at the hands of that committee?

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. PLUMB. With pleasure.

Mr. HOAR. I am in favor of his amendment and very much in favor of having it acted on now, and not put off to another bill. Therefore, I desire to ask him what his answer is, as his amendment now reads, to the point which has been made that the amendment provides for "the number of clerks for the Pension Office and Adjutant-General's and Surgeon-General's Offices, respectively, necessary to render effective the work of said examiners." Suppose the Secretary of the Interior, in whose Department the Pension Office is, thinks there should be clerks enough to use this whole appropriation in his Department, and suppose the Secretary of War, in whose Department the Adjutant-General's and Surgeon-General's Offices are, thinks that there should be clerks enough to use up the whole of it in his Department? Is it not necessary for the Senator from Kansas to devise some provision and put it on this amendment before it passes, which shall give somebody the authority of determining how many of these clerks shall be in each of these offices? So far as the Adjutant-General's and Surgeon-General's Offices are concerned it can be left to the Secretary of War to apportion them as he thinks fit. I ask this question not as an objection, but as a friend of the amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. We are vesting a large discretion with the heads of all these bureaus and the heads of the Departments; and there is no more reason to suppose that the Secretary of the Interior would arbitrarily insist on keeping all the clerks provided for by the amendment in his Department, whether necessary or unnecessary, than there is to suppose that he would do any other improper thing under the discretion we give him in this bill and have given him in other bills.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Will the Senator from Kansas consent to an amendment stating that this expenditure is to be made at the discretion of the President of the United States?

Mr. PLUMB. I was going to say that I hope some of those who are so much in favor of this amendment, and only objecting to the bill it is offered to be placed on, would suggest an amendment which would carry out their idea.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I suggest that amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. I am not going to contend for the language of the amendment. As I said before, I do not care about the form of it; I am after the substance. I want to make sure now, upon a bill that I know is going to pass beyond peradventure, that the existing condition of things in the Pension Bureau shall no longer continue to exist; that is to say, that there shall be an improvement.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion which may possibly obviate the difficulty? If the amendment should pass as it is, and if there should be a serious difficulty about the division of this money, there can be a provision in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill specifying how it shall be expended. If that difficulty should arise, if there were anything needed to be done, it could be very easily remedied that way, and the amendment could go on the bill as it is now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We had better remedy it now, if there is any trouble.

Mr. HOAR. I will make this suggestion to the Senator from Kansas, to add to his amendment these words:

The number and distribution of said clerks in the different offices and different Departments to be at the discretion of the President.

Mr. PLUMB. I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. That amendment is in order.

Mr. PLUMB. I am entirely willing that my amendment should be modified in that way, or in any other way which will make it more certain to have the effect which I desire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WITHERS. How will it read as proposed to be amended?

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of line 17 of section 1 it is proposed to insert:

To provide fifty additional examiners, and for rent for additional rooms or buildings therefor, for the Pension Office, and the number of clerks for the Pension Office and Adjutant-General's and Surgeon-General's Offices, respectively, necessary to render effective the work of said examiners, the sum of $200,000, to be immediately available, the number and distribution of said clerks in the different offices and different Departments to be at the discretion of the President.

Mr. BECK. I merely desire to say that I suppose that is upon the assumption that Congress is no longer competent to distribute these employés and the President must do it for Congress.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I suggest that the word "fifty" be stricken out before "additional examiners," leaving it all to the discretion of the President. I suggest that to the Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is an amendment to the amendment pending. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I see the Senator from Massachusetts has only used the word "clerks" in his amendment while the principal amendment mentions examiners and clerks.

Mr. HOAR. The examiners are clerks. Although they are called examiners, in reality there is no such official title, and what it means is only clerks to examine.

Mr. INGALLS. The word "examiners" should be stricken out.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As the law now stands there is no such office as examiner except in the Patent Office that I know of; but this is to be a law, and if the law does not provide for an official by the name of an examiner before, if this passes it will provide for it. Therefore, I suggest in the friendliest spirit to the amendment that the end of the clause ought to conform to the beginning, and that with the word "clerks" there ought to be the word "examiners" also.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator from Kansas to make the word "examiners," in the original sentence, read "examining clerks."

Mr. INGALLS. It would be better to leave out the word "examiners." They are all known as clerks of different classes. The only two designations in the Pension Office are clerks and copyists.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It certainly appears to me that as we are making a law, and not construing a law, we ought to use terms at the beginning and the end of the amendment that have some relation to each other. If the modification suggested in respect of the word "examiners" is adopted, so that the phrase will be "clerks," then the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will be in perfect accordance with the principal amendment; but without it, it seems to me it will leave the same gap open that existed before. It only allows the President to regulate the number and distribution of clerks, but does not allow him to regulate the number and distribution of the persons whom this law, being the last one, styles examiners.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDMUNDS. An amendment to that is not in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not in order at this time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it in order to perfect the paragraph that the Senator from Massachusetts proposes to amend?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is not to strike out, but is an additional paragraph, and the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment is in the second degree.

Mr. PLUMB. I suggest to the honorable Senator from Vermont to move his amendment after that of the Senator from Massachusetts is adopted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I understand the Chair to decide that when an amendment is pending and an amendment is offered to that it is not in order to perfect the text of the principal amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment being in the second degree, it cannot be in order to amend further. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not propose to amend the amendment moved by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that has been adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I propose to amend the text.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The text is an amendment, the Chair will state to the Senator from Vermont, and therefore the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is in the second degree, and there cannot be an amendment in the third degree unless it is to strike out and insert, when the part to be stricken out would be amendable; but that is not the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EATON. I think I shall not vote for the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts as I cannot vote for the amendment of the Senator from Kansas. I think this is all wrong. I have been for many years voting all the Department requires in the way of clerks and assistance. It is the manifest duty of each of the Departments and bureaus of the Government to inform the Senate and the House of the number of clerks that they desire. If this new bill will make a greater clerical force necessary, the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior will notify the proper committees of this and the other House of the increased clerical force which they desire, and then we shall be ready to give them that force. If they do not desire any more force, we ought not to throw away $200,000 of the people's money.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator yield to me to make a suggestion?

Mr. EATON. I will.

Mr. CONKLING. It cannot have escaped the attention of the Senator from Connecticut, first, that large numbers of pension claimants appeal to him to get them special facilities in the Pension Bureau, not that their cases may be decided one way or the other, but that they may be proceeded with in some way. In the second place the Senator must know that the Commissioner of Pensions and those who write by his direction, return answers month after month, year after year, that the reason of the delay, the reason of these applications to a Senator to induce the Commissioner to make a case "special," as they call it, in order that it may be taken up out of its turn, is the want of clerical force, the lack of the hands necessary to handle these papers, to go on with them and dispose of them promptly. In the presence, then, of these facts, if they be facts,—if not the Senator will correct me,—I ask him what the answer is to the thing which naturally occurs to every mind, that we ought on some bill, in some way, by some provision, to supply this need? The honorable Senator says they may ask for clerks when they want them. That no doubt is technically true; but when the Senator is informed as a Senator, when I am informed as a Senator, day after day, in answer to these letters, that the reason of all these delays, involving great hardships, as I am sure they do in some cases, is the lack of clerical assistance, how can we exactly stand upon saying, "they have not made a formal recommendation," or the head of a Department within some rule of the Senate has not put it technically in that way, and although we know the fact we will still wait, because they might in some other way bring it to our notice? I should like if the Senator from Connecticut will oblige me, to hear his views on that aspect of the case.

Mr. EATON. They are very simple, of course.

Mr. CONKLING. Always the Senator's views are.

Mr. EATON. Undoubtedly. Therefore I hardly thought my friend from New York would find it necessary to put a question of that kind. How does he or any other member of the Senate, my friend from Kansas who proposed the amendment, know now whether ten clerks are demanded, or five, or twenty, or fifty, or a hundred? How do we arrive at it? What is the proper legislation and the proper action for this body? It is to be informed by other public servants of what they demand and what they require. I apprehend that the Secretary of the Interior Department knows a great deal better than I how many clerks are necessary in the Pension Bureau, and surely the Commissioner of Pensions ought to know exactly what he desires and how many men he can profitably employ. When he tells us, I will vote with my friend from New York for every man that he desires; but why should we go upon a hunting expedition and a guessing expedition? I come from a guessing country, but I confess I can hardly guess out this problem of how many men shall go to this bureau and how many men to that bureau, and nobody else it seems can; and now it is said you will put it upon the President to do that. Which President, the one in or the one coming in——

Mr. CONKLING. Or the one that did not get in? [Laughter.]

Mr. EATON. The one that did not get in ought to have been in by the vote of the people. In my judgment the whole of this thing is wrong. I hardly think my friend from New York can answer the suggestion which I have so lamely made, and that is that an intelligent head of the Bureau of Pensions, an intelligent head of the War Department, and an intelligent head of the Interior Department may better number the clerical force they can properly use than any member of this body.

I conceive that my friend is answered, and therefore I shall vote against this amendment to the amendment, and against the amendment itself, and whenever the proper officer of the Government asks for more clerical assistance we will all join in giving it.

Mr. CONKLING. The honorable Senator from Connecticut says I am answered. That is true. I never ask the honorable Senator a question without receiving a polite answer. I have received it now; and meaning to be entirely courteous to him, I submit that that answer falls a good way short of the real demands of my question. The honorable Senator says we are not to go on a hunting expedition,—I believe that was his phrase,—to ascertain whether a greater number of clerks cannot be employed somewhere. I agree with him. Certainly we are not to go on a hunting expedition; and if this be such a proposal, no Senator should vote for it. But, Mr. President, that I submit to my honorable friend is rather fanciful. Here is in the country a great procession of mourners and of cripples that are entitled under the laws to the allowance of a pension. I will not stop now to consider whether under the theory suggested this morning by the language of one Senator this proceeds from benevolence, charity, generosity, magnanimity, or according to the view suggested by other Senators from principle which enter into contracts, obligations, dues, the holders of which do not need to throw themselves at anybody's feet or appeal to anybody's mercy. In the one way or in the other, either as the wards of the nation relying upon the benevolence of the nation, which I deny, or as the creditors of the nation appealing to the justice of the nation, which I affirm, great bodies of crippled men and smitten women and orphan children, have meritorious and well-earned claims upon the Government. They ask for their consideration. They are postponed, belated, and disappointed until thousands are weary, heart-sick, and starving. Their attorneys and the pension agents whom they employ appeal in great numbers to Senators. When Senators remember that in the State of New York there are 5,200,000 people, and that 600,000 of the sons of New York marched to the fields of battle, I shall not seem to exaggerate when I say that great numbers of persons such as I have described appeal to me in every month and every week of the year to aid them in gaining answers from the Pension Bureau, not in gaining a favorable result, not in inducing the Commissioner of Pensions to waive some requirement of evidence, to stretch some provision of law, to invent some way of favoring them, but to gain action, consideration, immediate proceeding upon their case which sometimes they say for months has waited and sometimes they say for years has waited an adjudication.

When I do appeal to the Commissioner of Pensions it happens not always—because very often there comes a decision or a suggestion or a letter of advice or a response of some sort indicating that notice is taken, consideration is given to the case to which attention is called, but at other times comes now and again an explanation, sometimes in a letter specially written sometimes if I mistake not in a printed circular printed to be sent I infer by thousands as a wholesale explanation, sometimes again I think in a lithographed letter showing that it is produced in manifold and sent as a wholesale explanation stating in various forms with different illustration and particularity that the Pension Bureau is embargoed, arrested, swamped in its business. Why? Because conducting its business almost wholly by the employment of clerical force, that force is deficient; because there are not clerks enough, or to state it differently, there cannot be employed and secured hours enough of clerical force to examine, classify, and subject to the scrutiny which they are to undergo the papers which exhibit the claims of pensioners.

Having been informed of this again and again, by individual letters, by circulars, by other forms of information signed and sent out officially by the Commissioner of Pensions, the head of the bureau concerned, can the honorable Senator from Connecticut, candid and intelligent as he is, dispose of the matter by turning to me and saying that we are not called upon to go upon hunting expeditions to see if we cannot find a place where more clerks might be used? I submit to that honorable Senator in whose sense of justice and in whose benevolence I have entire confidence, that such a state of facts as this summons us to our feet, and that we cannot turn it off by saying "Oh, well, no doubt, but then there is some technicality which somebody might have complied with and has not." The Secretary of the Interior whom the Senator seems to regard as the repository of the most full, exact, and particular information on this subject—an allegation with which I do not take issue—has not said something that he might have said; and then again the Commissioner of Pensions although he has said a great deal and although he has said it a great many times and although he may have said it individually to all the members of both Houses, has not, speaking to those members altogether as the Houses, or speaking to his superior through whom he might speak to these two Houses, said all this; and therefore we shall be speculating, we shall be on a hunting expedition, we shall be going out as if to find by hook or by crook some place where the money of the Government may be spent.

I submit to the Senator from Connecticut, that is technical; it is very technical. It would be technical were the persons concerned here all astute business men, were every one of these pensioners a man taught in all the methods of presenting and advancing his claims; but when we consider that we are dealing with the untaught, the helpless, the friendless, men who do not understand the circumlocution office, women and children who have few means of intelligence or otherwise in pressing their claims, I submit that we are bound to be a little more liberal, a little less exacting of technicality from the heads of the Departments or bureaus; and when there is brought in any way to our notice the fact that vast numbers of persons are being victimized with that injustice which is as bad as refusal or denial, interminable delay, we have no right to go behind an excuse like this and say we will wait until all the ceremonies and requirements are complied with, we will let all the pensioners who are the subjects of such hardship as I have been speaking of go over from the 4th of March till the first Monday in December next, and then if there should be another Secretary of the Interior endowed with all the knowledge, general and particular, which the Senator from Connecticut ascribes to the present distinguished head of that Department, and he sends to the Senate a communication in which he says that this matter has reached his attention also, why then we will feel that all the requirements are rounded out and that the whole measure of occasion for our action has arrived.

As to the phraseology of this amendment I have not scrutinized it. It came from a Senator whom I supposed to be more familiar than I am with the requirement of the occasion. It was voted for, I observed, first voted for as in order on this bill, and afterward as meritorious, by certain distinguished members of the Committee on Appropriations, whom I am accustomed to follow. I observed that some of the Senators to whom I refer have modified their views. Coming first into the Senate I heard years ago a distinguished member of the body state how safe it was, particularly for inexperienced members, to follow the committees, and that duty was laid down so broadly that I infer that one so inexperienced as I need not know much in order to vote intelligently, except that what the committee say. When the committee divide somewhat politically as in this instance, and the members of the committee representing the party to which I belong, upon a matter which is supposed in some sort to appeal to what may sometimes grow into party divisions, when the republican members of the committee act together, I have been of the impression that it was suitable for me to pay a good deal of heed to their course, because they are supposed to have a greater acquaintance with the matters committed to them. So I was influenced, I confess, considerably both upon the question of order and upon the question of the propriety and sufficiency of this amendment, by the position I saw wiser and better acquainted Senators holding.

Now, I humbly submit that if this subject was in order on this bill, as I thought it was and as I still think it is, notwithstanding the provision about general legislation, and if the amendment in outline and substance is meritorious, we ought not after this discussion to abandon it and throw it down, and postpone to some other bill to come hereafter not only this subject but a rediscussion of it. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts seems to me to avoid the only serious difficulty which has been suggested. If there is another one let us hear what that is, and if we can obviate that let us do it, and then if the amount is too large cut it down. If the amendment does not commit to the discretion of these officials and to their conscience and their oath to expend only so much of this money as is actually necessary, by all means let the amendment be made rigorous and searching in that regard; but still let us, as it seems to me we ought if satisfied that injury is constantly occurring because of the deficiency of clerical force, make provision which will supply at least in part that deficiency.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I did not intend to provoke a discussion with my friend from New York, for I should be in the unfortunate position that the coon was with the celebrated Captain Scott, and I might as well come down at once; but I do not think that my friend from New York meets the question, I will not say fairly, but properly. He immediately begins to speak of the numerous pensioners, the poor men and women and children who are suffering, and appeals to our feelings in that particular. That is not a part properly of this discussion. What is necessary to carry out the law and who are the proper persons to determine the amount of clerical force necessary to carry out the law? That is the question and the only question. There is no other.

My friend says that I seem to place the utmost confidence in the present Secretary of the Interior. I believe I have as much confidence in him as it is necessary for me to have in that officer. So I have in the Commissioner of Pensions; and it is this much: I have sufficient confidence in his knowledge to believe that he knows the amount of clerical force necessary to carry on his Department. That is very certain. What is the object of having heads of Departments unless it is that they may inform the Senate and House of Representatives of what is necessary in order to properly carry on the Government? I am not second to my friend from New York but fully abreast with him in being desirous of doing all that is necessary for this class of Government creditors. I assume his own terms; but there is a way to get at this which I think is the proper way and all other ways are improper. Are fifty clerks more enough? Who can say? Who can say whether forty is not enough, and who can say that one hundred are not required?

Mr. CONKLING. May I make a suggestion?

Mr. EATON. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator understand that under the amendment, if it become a law, any honest man as Secretary of the Interior or Commissioner of Pensions would employ clerks who were not necessary, would expend the whole of this money if a part of it only turned out to be needed?

Mr. EATON. That is not a part of my argument. I have made no such suggestion.

Mr. CONKLING. No; but my honorable friend objects to it because he says he does not know the exact number. He says they do know. Very well, if they do know I ask him whether he thinks, being honest men, they would employ an unnecessary number.

Mr. EATON. I hope not, but I want to relate a little experience that I have had as one of a committee of this Senate. Some four years ago five members of this body were appointed to examine the various Departments of the Government, to look out, to report to the Senate with regard to the employés. I remember distinctly as one of that committee of advising a certain head of a Department that he ought to give his clerks one hour more labor. We had not the authority to compel it, but the hour was given, and the number of clerks was not reduced. Acting upon the suggestion of the committee, the additional hour's work was given to the clerks, but no reduction was made, when there should have been not less than three hundred dismissed, if they all worked the additional hour; and that was apart from any idea that I have here to-day. The Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of War, the Surgeon-General, the Commissioner of Pensions ought to know the number of clerks that they can best employ, and when they inform us of the number they desire we will give them that number. I do not myself propose to vote to force any upon them.

DEATH OF HON. EVARTS W. FARR.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. THEODORE F. KING, one of its clerks, communicating to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. EVARTS W. FARR, late a Representative from the State of New Hampshire, and transmitting the resolutions of the House thereon.

Mr. ROLLINS. I move that the business of the Senate be suspended and call for the reading of the resolutions of the House of Representatives announcing the death of Mr. FARR, late a member of the House from the State of New Hampshire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asks that the pending order be suspended for the purpose he has named. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and the resolutions of the House of Representatives will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That this House has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. EVARTS W. FARR, late a Representative from the State of New Hampshire.

Resolved, That in token of regard for the memory of the lamented deceased the members of this House do wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House do communicate these resolutions to the Senate of the United States.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased this House do now adjourn.

Mr. ROLLINS. Mr. President, I move that the resolutions which I send to the Chair be adopted by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolutions will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolutions of Mr. ROLLINS, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has received with profound sensibility the sad announcement of the death of Hon. EVARTS W. FARR, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of New Hampshire.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect for the memory of Mr. FARR, the members of the Senate will wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That the sympathies of the members of the Senate be tendered to the family of the deceased in this bereavement, and that the Secretary of the Senate transmit to them a copy of these resolutions.

Mr. ROLLINS. Mr. President, it is now almost a quarter of a century since a member of the delegation from the State of New Hampshire has been called upon to announce the death of a colleague in either branch of Congress. Since the adoption of the Constitution, four Senators from New Hampshire have died during their terms of office—Nicholas Gilman, in 1814; Charles G. Atherton, in 1853; Moses Norris, jr., in 1855; and James Bell, in 1857; although out of the thirty-five Senators who have represented the State prior to the present incumbents but six are now living.

In the other branch for the first time a vacancy has occurred by the death of Major E. W. FARR, the youngest member of our delegation, in the prime of his manhood and but a few days after the people of his district had indorsed his ability and worth by a re-election. In the midst of life we are in death. The great leveler invades all ranks and conditions of life, paying no regard to age or sex, strength or weakness.

In this case the blow fell with little warning and but a brief illness, and it is a significant admonition to us to be always ready to meet that last call to enter upon the new state which awaits us beyond the confines of this earthly existence and there solve the mystery which during all time our human intelligence has not been able satisfactorily to penetrate, except that we are fain to accept the faith that death is but the portal to a new existence and that if a man die he shall live again. The survivors may mourn their loss more grievously when it comes without warning, but it is well with the departed. My acquaintance with Major FARR began in the early days of the great struggle for the preservation of the Union, in April, 1861, when the first call to arms was responded to with so much alacrity, not only by our late and lamented friend, but by so many others in the North. From that time until the day when the sad intelligence of his death was communicated to me by telegraph from his quiet home among the mountains, I watched with interest his career, both in the Army and in civil life, and our friendship was never for one moment interrupted. In his death I mourn the loss of a true, long-tried, and esteemed friend.

Major FARR was born in Littleton, New Hampshire, October 10, 1840. At the early age of twelve, with that independence so charateristic in later years, he struck out for himself, and, by that rugged toil which is not unfamiliar to many New England boys, began to earn his own support and provide means to secure an education. In the fall of 1856 he entered upon his preparatory course for college at the academy at Thetford, Vermont, leaving that with valedictory honors in 1859 for Dartmouth College. His collegiate course was interrupted by the call to arms, and in April, 1861, his name appears first in his native town and among the first in the State enrolled among the volunteers. Subsequently he was appointed a lieutenant in the Second New Hampshire Regiment.

During the first year he was prostrated by disease and sent to the hospital in this city, but an indomitable will and strong constitution carried him through, and as soon as he recovered his strength he returned to his regiment. January 1, 1862, he received his commission as captain and on the 5th of May following in the battle of Williamsburgh during a drenching rain his right arm was shattered by a Minnie ball while he was in the act of firing. With characteristic coolness he picked up his revolver with his left hand and passed to the rear, where he remained forty-eight hours in a dilapidated building without doors or windows, in his wet clothing; he was then conveyed to Fortress Monroe and was sent home, where he arrived in fifteen days after receiving the wound which deprived him of his arm. Impatient of this enforced retirement, in six weeks he returned to the front. Soon after he was appointed major of the Eleventh New Hampshire Regiment, and as such participated in the battle of Fredericksburgh, December 13, 1862. With his regiment he was under General Grant at the siege of Vicksburgh. Later he was detailed as judge-advocate on court-martial duty at Cincinnati and Washington, and after the close of the war studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1867. He was assistant assessor of internal revenue, and subsequently assessor, which office he held until 1873 when the office was abolished.

As a soldier he was chivalrous and brave, bearing a record without blemish, ever present when duty called. As an officer, cool and courageous in danger, strict in discipline, but by his general kindness endeared to all his men, winning the highest estimation of all who knew him and the confidence of his seniors in command. As a lawyer he won a good position and was known as a safe counselor, earning the confidence of his clients and the community. As a politician he was frank and outspoken, leaving no doubt as to his position, and while a stalwart republican, possessed many warm friends among his political opponents.

In 1876 he was elected a member of the governor's council from his district; he was twice appointed prosecuting attorney for his county, resigning that position to take his seat in the present Congress to which he was elected in 1878. At the recent election (November, 1880) he was re-elected to the Forty-seventh Congress in one of the most hotly contested campaigns known in his district, which is a very close one, thus showing the estimation in which he was held by his constituents.

As a member of the House of Representatives he proved himself industrious and efficient; as in the Army, he was never absent from his post of duty except from imperative necessity.

It is said that a prophet is not without honor save in his own country, but the following tribute will show how Major FARR was appreciated in his own community, and this tribute will be indorsed by every member of that community:

To speak of him as a man is to fully know him as a citizen and neighbor, a husband and father, an associate and friend. As a citizen he was just, kind, and public-spirited; as a husband and father ardent and constant in his affections and ever tenderly devoted; as a friend and associate there was no one more loyal, liberal, and unselfish; quick to resent an injury, he was placable and ready to forgive. If he ever unknowingly wronged another, (knowingly he could not have done it,) his magnanimity in redressing it was prompt, noble, and conspicuous. As a public man his integrity and honor were never questioned; incorruptible and sincere, he was ever ready alike to defend a friend and the friendless. Once his confidence was won nothing but dishonor could sever the tie that bound him to his fellowman. Can it be wondered that his people loved and trusted such exemplary manhood?

Warm-hearted, sincere, and generous to a fault, he possessed a genuine magnetism which attracted and held all who approached him.

Entering the Army while not yet twenty-one, with a vigorous and robust constitution, he left it four years later deprived of his right arm and with the seeds of disease about him which rendered him unable to recuperate from the sudden attack, coming as it did just at the end of an arduous and exhausting campaign. His loss is not alone a sad bereavement to his aged father and mother, to his wife and young children, but to the community in which he lived and was honored and to the State which he represented. Struck down in the pride of his manhood, he has left a void which will be hard to fill. To those who were near and dear to him, to his friends and neighbors, and to his State we extend our hearty sympathy, not unmindful that this Congress is also called upon to deplore another break in its family circle and another chair made vacant by his untimely death.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, there is no solitude like that which envelopes a public man amid the multiplied and exacting activities which environ him in the Capitol of his country. I have never felt so utterly alone as when most absorbed in my duties here. The continuous woods, vast, dark and silent, are full of tender companionship, and the spirit of nature speaks with many-voiced and varied tones to him who seeks her wild and secret home. But here one seems to be projected as it were into a kaleidoscopic and tumultuous scene where though all may be light, beauty, and variety, yet when analyzed the elements of the fascinating vision are mere glass and glitter without one ray of heat or throb of sympathy.

Every public man is all alone in a certain and substantial sense. His connections are with his distant constituency; and only with them through the post, the telegraph, and other avenues of communication does he really live. Now and then there is a break through the environment of affairs, and for a little while in cheerful or mournful but always heartfelt communion with a congenial soul there is a brief return of the old-time sense of hearty feeling and of that unrestrained personal and independent self-assertion which belongs of right to the private citizen. Yet how soon the opening closes and the tempest of affairs obscures the whole heavens once more.

We talk and laugh and discuss. We are cheerful and polite—it may be bland and entertaining. We sit side by side; but we are still as far apart as the localities from which we come. There is ever the touch of the hand, the glance of the eye, the friendly tone, and the ready effort to oblige; yet after all the real life of the public man is between himself and those who created him by their choice. He belongs to them. He is of them in the truest and most absorbing sense, and not of those with whom he daily meets on this conspicuous scene. But there be those like the stars which illumine the neglected spaces of night, who, by their select and electric qualities, change the chilly formalities of public association into the warmth and sympathy of private life. These rare spirits are the golden links which connect us and somewhat cure our isolation. They give out not light alone but heat as well, and while they illumine all things, they also warm and weld us together.

But alas! Death, blind, cruel, and insatiable, will tear even them away with no more compunction than when he extorts the spirit of the beast which goeth downward. He > Loves a shining mark, a signal blow,

> A blow which, while it executes, alarms
> And startles thousands with a single fall.

Of such a man, my personal friend for twenty years, my associate and companion in private and in public life, just stricken down in all the royal strength of forty years, while his sun was high and rising higher on the pathway, it might well have been to the very zenith of place and power, just as he had achieved a personal and political triumph such as comes to but few men even in the longest career, it is my difficult but willing duty for a few moments to speak to you to-day.

Major EVARTS W. FARR, a member of the Forty-sixth House of Representatives and a member-elect of the Forty-seventh, from the third congressional district of New Hampshire, died at his home in Littleton, in that State, on the 30th day of November last, aged forty years. He was born in the same place on the 10th day of October, 1840, of one of the largest and most influential families in our State. His father, who survives the gifted son, filled many conspicuous positions in public life, and through a long course of great activity and usefulness to his fellow-men, he was ever the same intelligent, upright, and efficient gentleman, who, for thirty years at least has been known throughout New Hampshire as "Honest John Farr of Littleton."

The mother was in every way worthy of the father of her boy; and to one who knew them all, it is sufficient eulogy to say that they were worthy each of the other. No young man was ever "better born," in the highest sense, than Major FARR, and his career has reflected great honor upon the family name.

Young FARR was of an active and independent spirit from the beginning. When twelve years of age he assumed the burden of his own support and education. He secured the advantages of the common schools in his native town, and after a preparatory course at the academy located in Thetford, Vermont, then under the direction of Professor Hiram Orcutt, and one of the best institutions in New England, he entered Dartmouth College with the class which graduated in 1863. He was pursuing his studies there with assiduity and great promise when the country called her sons to rebaptize in their blood the sacred principles of liberty and to re-establish upon immovable foundations the integrity and perpetuity of her Constitution and her laws. He was then twenty years old, of stalwart but graceful form, with a countenance full of animation, force, and beauty.

That face was the mirror of all within. I well remember a long conversation with him while attending court in Haverhill, where he chanced to be in the early spring of 1861, just as the mutterings of war became unmistakable to us in our mountain homes. We were then beginning life; I had just entered upon the practice of the law. He designed to pursue that profession as soon as his course of study and preparation would permit. Our conversation lasted nearly through the live-long night, and I desire to bear witness to the memory of my dead friend, that never did man determine to put aside, if need be, the promise of an apparently unsullied future for the untried hardships of the camp and field, with a more vivid sense of what he was to sacrifice and suffer, or with a loftier patriotism and deeper devotion to a stern sense of duty than did EVARTS W. FARR. And when a little later the summons echoed from the walls of beleaguered and then of fallen Sumter all over the astonished North, he strode among the earliest to the field of death and of glory with motives as pure and free from sectional hate, with as knightly and exalted devotion to the ideas of country, liberty, and the good of mankind as ever beat in the bosom of Sidney, or as animated the fathers at Yorktown, Cowpens, or Bunker Hill.

He served in some of the hardest fought actions with great bravery and brilliancy, and throughout the war, losing an arm at Williamsburgh, and receiving the fatal seeds of death in his constitution from exposure in the swamps of the Peninsula, which ripened year by year until a casual cold fastened upon his waning powers and killed him as easily as though he had been a little child. On his return to civil life he studied law, and being admitted to the bar, he practiced the profession unremittingly and with good success from 1867 until his election to the Forty-sixth Congress. He was twice appointed prosecuting attorney for his native county, and held that office when called to service in the halls of national legislation. During this period also he was chosen to be a member of the governor's council, after a most vigorous canvass, from a strongly democratic district, in which but for his great personal popularity success would have been impossible.

As a lawyer Major FARR was highly successful. His attainments for one of his years and opportunities were good. His comprehension of the fundamental principles of law was clear and strong. He had an unfailing fund of good sense, which is worth more to a lawyer than knowledge of every case of every court ever reported when not combined with that unfailing touchstone of truth. He knew what the jury thought and could guide them in his own channels of reasoning to the conclusions in which he believed himself. He had little power to make the worse appear the better reason unless he was honestly wrong, and he always presented his cause with a conscientious conviction that he was right. He had a native love of justice and abhorrence of wrong. He was a tower of strength to the innocent and to the cause he believed to be just, but to none other. He was an honor to the bar, and by his high character and conduct he fully paid that difficult debt which every lawyer owes to his profession.

Having fought to preserve his country, he should be excused for manifesting that interest in preserving the results of the national victory which made him a close observer of events and gave to his mind a bias for public life. His intelligence, his patriotism, and popular manners for years had attracted the attention of the people, and it had long been evident that at an early period he would be summoned to the higher political honors of his State. This expectation was realized by his election in a very close district to the other House.

Every one who has experienced them knows the almost insurmountable difficulties which lie in the way of a new member of a great legislative body, especially if he belongs to the minority. A new member of the majority has comparatively plain sailing in an open sea. But short as has been his connection with the House, only through one regular session, Major FARR had become well known and was very highly esteemed by his fellow-members, both for his ability and worth. He was attentive to every duty and he understood what belonged to it and how to perform it. He was an elegant speaker, very ready in debate and grew stronger every day. I observed this during the late campaign particularly, and believe that had he lived and continued in Congress long enough to do justice to himself and constituents, he would have served his country with great efficiency to the pride of his innumerable friends and of the State. As it was the promise given of that which might have been, sharpens a disappointment most grevious to be borne, even if the full fruition of accomplishment could lend to those who knew and loved him its most consoling power.

His stricken widow and the children of their love bewail in mute and helpless grief a bereavement which lacks none of the terrors of untimely death, of blasted hopes, and of sweetest joys, snatched away in the very hour of supreme realization. To this brave and worthy woman, left to battle and struggle alone with her burden of woe through unusual obstacles, and to these fatherless little ones, some of whom can hardly know their loss, a grateful country will not fail to extend the warmest sympathy and most grateful remembrance.

But I do waste the time in bewailing his loss. His last deed on earth is done. His record is complete. No blot is there. It is pure as the white pages of the Book of Life. It is like a copy drawn by angel hands for the imitation of those who remain behind. To have prolonged his stay would seem to have been best for us, were he not one of the dead who yet speak with power drawn from the realizations of more worlds than one. His glory will not fade nor will he be forgotten until the history of his State is obliterated. There may have been stronger men, but he was strong; there may have been better men, but I have not known them.

New Hampshire is not ashamed of her other sons. She points to them as her jewels. But of none can she more truly say that he was a knight "without fear and without reproach" than of poor dead FARR, now embalmed in the immortal glory of his own life, and awaiting the reveille of the resurrection on the peaceful banks of the wild Ammonoosuck, while the shadows of Mount Washington lie tenderly on his grave. There is nothing more but to turn slowly and sadly to the exacting realities of life, and by imitation of his bright example to prepare for the inevitable hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The resolutions were agreed to unanimously.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and twelve minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 8, 1881.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

BUSINESS BY CONSENT.

Mr. FRYE. I am instructed by the Committee on Rules to present the resolution which I send to the desk.

Mr. CLYMER. I reserve all points of order on it.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, After Wednesday next, on each day of the remainder of the session other than the third Monday of February and the last six days, whenever on motion the morning hour shall be dispensed with by a two-thirds vote, that hour shall be set apart for the consideration of bills on the several calendars under the following regulations: The States and Territories shall be called in order as now provided for, and as each is called, one of its members shall be named by the Speaker, selected in alphabetical order, who may move the consideration of a bill; if objected to by five members rising in their seats it shall not be considered, otherwise the member making the motion shall be entitled to five minutes for explanation of his bill, or, instead thereof, to the reading of the report accompanying the same, and then a vote shall be taken. The call of States shall go on from day to day until completed, as above provided, and whenever all the Members and Delegates from any State or Territory have been named by the Speaker, such State or Territory shall thereafter be omitted from the call until all the Members and Delegates shall have been so named. Any member not answering as his name is called shall be considered to have waived his privilege.

Mr. CLYMER. I ask that the consideration of the resolution be postponed till to-morrow under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks that under the rule this resolution shall lie over one day. That is the gentleman's right. The Chair would suggest that the resolution be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. NEWBERRY. I desire to suggest an amendment.

The SPEAKER. That may be done when the resolution comes before the House for action.

Mr. NEWBERRY. I should like to suggest now that the consideration of bills on the Speaker's table be included in the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The committee only included the calendars because they only wished to recognize the right as applying to bills that had actually been reported by committees of this House. The committee thought in the case of every bill to be considered under this resolution, as far as possible, there should be a report from a committee of the House in favor of such bill.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. REAGAN. I rise to a privileged question. I desire to report back from the Committee on Commerce the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. What action does the gentleman desire?

Mr. REAGAN. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and I give notice that I shall, when the morning hour is through, move that the House go into Committee of the Whole to consider the bill.

Mr. CLYMER. I reserve all points of order.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope the gentleman from Texas will not press the river and harbor bill this morning.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he will recognize the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, because the gentleman from Tennessee some days ago gave notice to the House that he would to-day move to proceed to the consideration of the legislative bill.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to dispense with the morning hour, my object being to take up the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to state——

The SPEAKER. Priority of business is not debatable.

Mr. REAGAN. I know that; but I wish to suggest to the Speaker here are two bills standing on equal ground represented by committees of equal dignity coming before the House. The Committee on Commerce presented this bill——

The SPEAKER. That is in the nature of debate.

Mr. REAGAN. But because the gentleman from Tennessee gave notice that he would call up another bill the Speaker chooses to give priority to the bill reported from the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] had given notice to the House that he would call up that bill to-day.

Mr. ATKINS. I trust I may be allowed a word of reply. As the Speaker has already stated, I gave notice last week I would this morning call up the legislative appropriation bill; and I do not think the gentleman from Texas should make remarks of the character in which he has indulged.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas has no right to complain of the action of the Chair in recognizing the gentleman from Tennessee. The notice was given in open House. The Chair thinks that the legislative appropriation bill should have preference under the circumstances. The gentleman from Texas had on yesterday an opportunity to bring the river and harbor bill before the House. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] moves that the morning hour of to-day be dispensed with.

Mr. FROST. The gentleman from Tennessee yields to me for a moment to call up from the Speaker's table the Senate bill No. 781 and to ask that it may be put on its passage.

Mr. ROBESON. Will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] yield to me afterward to call up a bill? That is what I want to know.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded, which is the motion of the gentleman from Tennesssee [Mr. ATKINS] to dipense with the morning hour for reports of committees.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. GOODE. Will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] yield to me for a moment?

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been called for.

Mr. GOODE. I think not since the morning hour was dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. It was, and but a moment since.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. I now report from the Committee on Appropriations the bill (H. R. No. 7101) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, and move that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. They will be reserved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to give notice that in Committee of the Whole I will antagonize the legislative appropriation bill with the river and harbor appropriation bill.

Mr. COX. And I desire to call up the unfinished business, being the apportionment bill, which I hope may be finished to-day.

Mr. ATKINS. Well, we will have to fight it out in Committee of the Whole. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, my purpose being to proceed with the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. REAGAN. And in Committee of the Whole I shall insist upon going on with the river and harbor appropriation bill.

Mr. ATKINS. That is all right.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to inquire if the order has been made to refer the river and harbor appropriation bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and all points of order on the bill were reserved.

Mr. McLANE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McLANE. Not to embarrass my friend from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] or the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, [Mr. REAGAN,] I desire to know whether the bill which the chairman of the Committee on Commerce proposed to report to the House has been received and referred to the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. It has been, on the motion of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] and all points of order on the bill were reserved by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CLYMER.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the House shall now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, can the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] antagonize in the committee the bill of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS?] Under the rules we must in committee consider the bills in the order in which they are upon the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the rule to be read; clause 9, Rule XVI.

Mr. COX. I want the Chair to remember that I have raised the question of consideration for the purpose of going on with the apportionment bill as unfinished business.

Mr. ATKINS. I suggest to my friend from New York [Mr. COX] to allow us to go into Committee of the Whole, and we will fight it out on that line.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause both rules to be read, applicable to the controversy, between the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

The Clerk read clause 4 of Rule XXIV, as follows:

After the hour shall have been devoted to reports from committees, it shall be in order to proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business in which the House may have been engaged at an adjournment, and at the same time each day thereafter, other than the first and third Mondays, until disposed of; and it shall be in order to proceed to the consideration of all other unfinished business whenever the class of business to which it belongs shall be in order.

The Clerk also read clause 9 of Rule XVI, as follows:

At any time after the expiration of the morning hour it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills raising revenue or general appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. Under the clause of the rule which has just been read the Chair is bound to recognize the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] to submit a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering a specific bill, a general appropriation bill. Should that motion be voted down, the Chair would then recognize the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] or the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] to move to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the river and harber bill, or to call up the unfinished business respectively, should there be no intervening motion having a higher privilege than the river and harbor bill or the unfinished business.

Mr. ATKINS. I submit the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. FRYE. Will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] yield to me on a matter of privilege, to submit an order touching the use of the galleries of the House during to-morrow's proceedings?

Mr. ATKINS. I will do so if I can in order.

The SPEAKER. It can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. FRYE. It will take but a moment.

The SPEAKER. The order will be read.

ADMISSION TO GALLERIES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. FRYE. I will read the order:

Ordered, That on Wednesday, February 9, the whole of the east gallery shall be reserved for the use of the families of the members of the Senate and the House and their visitors. The Doorkeeper shall strictly enforce this order.

I offer this at the request of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BROWNE. The latter portion of the order should be changed so as to secure equality among members as nearly as possible.

Mr. BUCKNER. The east galleries will not accommodate all the families of members. I suggest that they be admitted to the space in the rear of the seats.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that has never been done during the proceedings attending an electoral count.

Mr. VALENTINE. Will the construction of that order be to admit the families of members on the Speaker's pass, or on the passes of the members themselves?

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes not on the Speaker's pass.

Mr. VALENTINE. If it is meant that under this resolution persons are to be admitted upon the red tickets which members have already given out, there are enough persons now in the city holding such tickets to more than fill the galleries mentioned; and they will be filled so early that the families of members will have no chance.

The SPEAKER. Those tickets admit persons to the visitors' gallery—not to the galleries intended for members' families. The resolution proposes no restriction, as the Chair understands, in regard to the members' gallery on the left.

Mr. PHILIPS. I wish to inquire how, under the operation of this resolution, the doorkeepers are to ascertain who are the families and visitors of members. As is well understood, there are now out a great many passes given to various parties by members. It seems to me that this resolution ought to be accompanied with some provision for the issue of new passes for this occasion.

Mr. DIBRELL. How many passes will each Senator and Representative be allowed to give

Mr. FRYE. I think gentlemen of the House do not understand the effect of this resolution. It proposes that the gallery on the east side of the Hall be reserved for the families of members and visitors to their families. Every gentleman sending any person into that gallery will do so upon the pledge on his honor that the person is a member of his family or a visitor to his family. I am sorry to say that in this respect members have not adhered to the intention of the rule; and it has been necessary to issue strict orders to the Doorkeeper to enforce the rule. No member has had the right to issue a pass to the gallery appropriated to families of members and their visitors. Properly, under the rules, admission there is obtained only upon a card given by the Speaker of the House for the use of the family of a member. Now this gallery here on the west side of the Hall has been reserved for the use of members; and they have been entitled to issue passes to it. Under this proposed order members will still have the right to give passes to that gallery. The diplomatic gallery is of course reserved for members of the diplomatic corps; so that members will see how much of our galleries will be left for the general public. If members of the House and the Senate will themselves observe the requirements of this order and send to the gallery indicated none others than their families and visitors to their families, there will be ample room.

Mr. O'NEILL. What is to become of visitors in the city who are not visitors to the families of members of Congress?

Mr. FRYE, (exhibiting a card.) There is a pass of the Speaker issued to the family of a member, and every member is entitled to one such card. It is signed by the Speaker, and is called the Speaker's pass.

Mr. O'NEILL. I think to-morrow should be a day specifically given to the people who have come to this capital to witness the count, and that we should not restrict too much the use of the galleries. There are many people in the city not visiting the families of members of Congress who desire to be present here to-morrow, and I think we should recognize that they have some right to be accommodated.

Mr. PHILIPS. My suggestion had reference to the fact that passes may now be out in the possession of parties not entitled to entrance to that gallery. Hence it might be proper to have the doorkeepers instructed to permit no one to enter that gallery except upon a pass of this date. This would effectually prevent the abuse which gentlemen complain of.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that admission to the front bench of the members' gallery has been placed at the disposal of the Speaker; but he has not confined such admission to members of his family and visitors of his family. He has issued cards of admission over and over again to members having as guests distinguished gentlemen from their districts, whom there was no other way to accommodate. He has also several times given admission to that bench to members of the British Parliament, because he was not able under the rule to ask consent to bring such persons on the floor.

Mr. BREWER. I think the resolution should be amended so as to provide that not exceeding five persons shall be admitted upon any one pass.

Mr. PRICE. That will be ten times as many as there will be room for.

Mr. BREWER. It is understood very well that without some restriction of this kind there are members of this House who would almost fill one of those galleries with citizens of Washington, bringing them in as members of their families. I have seen it done frequently; and it will be done to-morrow unless we adopt some provision to prevent it. We do not want those seats filled so that the wives or families of members cannot find accommodation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that an average of one person for each Senator and member would fill the space thus far suggested.

Mr. BREWER. Unless we adopt a limitation of this kind, those galleries will be filled by those who will enter upon the passes of not exceeding twenty members.

The SPEAKER. An average of five persons to each Senator or member would make near two thousand persons.

Mr. BREWER. I suggest that a certain limited number of tickets be issued to each member and each Senator.

Mr. BAILEY. Can this resolution be amended?

The SPEAKER. It can be; the resolution is before the House.

Mr. BAILEY. I move to amend by striking out the words "and their visitors."

The SPEAKER. The Chair entertains that amendment. The gentleman from New York moves to amend the resolution so that practically the right of admission shall be restricted to the immediate families of members or Senators.

Mr. BROWNE. I think we had better leave the galleries in just the condition in which they are now left by the rules. The rule admits members, their families, and the visitors of their families to the galleries provided on the east side of the Hall; and members may give passes to the members' gallery on the west side. We cannot now undertake to adjust these differences in a way satisfactory to all members of the House. There are two hundred and ninety-three members, and I believe eight delegates, making over three hundred. If each of these three hundred gentlemen should issue a pass to but one person these galleries would be filled. I think, therefore, we had better let those who can obtain, under the rule, admission to the members' gallery do so, leaving the residue of these galleries open to the general public, of whom the most vigilant will obtain seats, while the others will be excluded.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I think this matter is already well regulated. If you allow the word "visitors" to go into that resolution the result will be that it will embrace the whole country. Members who have no wives here, who have no families, will be allowed to issue as many passes as they please to their lady friends, and the result will be that gallery will be crowded with people who are in nowise connected with a member or his family. There are enough of ladies in this city now who are of the families of members to fill that gallery, and I trust that change will not be made. You will find before eight o'clock to-morrow morning, if this resolution is adopted, that those galleries will be filled with visitors, and when members' wives come here they will not be allowed to enter. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that and allow the whole subject to be referred to the Committee on Rules, with instructions to act in the matter as they may think fit. That will give general satisfaction. The Committee on Rules can take such measures as they deem fit.

Mr. HILL. I have no objection to that.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Ohio withdraws the motion to lay upon the table, and allows me to move the reference of the whole subject to the Committee on Rules, to take such action as seems to them fit.

Mr. ROBESON. With the gentleman's permission, I wish to say a word.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I move to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. ROBESON. Let me make a suggestion. That gallery will hold perhaps four hundred people. I do not exactly know how many—say five hundred people. By giving to each member a limited number of tickets, to dispose of to whom he pleases, to his family, if he wishes, to his friends, if he prefers, then you will be absolutely fair, and each man will enjoy equal rights through his representatives there. I move as an amendment that three tickets be issued to each member of this House and three to each member of the Senate, signed by the Speaker, for admittance to that gallery to-morrow, and that no other tickets be recognized.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that the Committee on Rules have considered this subject.

Several MEMBERS. Three tickets are too many to each Member and Senator. The gallery will not hold that number.

The SPEAKER. That will make twelve hundred tickets, and there is no room for more than four hundred, if properly accommodated, in the space mentioned.

Mr. ROBESON. I withdraw the word "three" and make it "two."

Several MEMBERS. Make it one.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to refer the whole subject to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain that motion.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. And I move to lay the whole subject upon the table.

The motion of Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, was disagreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask now to have a vote on my motion to refer the whole subject to the Committee on Rules, with the power to take such action as in their judgment may seem best.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that the Committee on Rules have considered this subject——

Mr. McCOOK. I hope the Chair will give to the House a parliamentary definition of the word "family." [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. It is not within the scope of duty of the Chair to do so. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I think some provision should be made for issuing tickets for all the galleries to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The question will be on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, to refer the whole subject to the Committee on Rules to take such action as to them may seem best.

Mr. FRYE. What is the use of doing that? The Committee on Rules cannot meet to-day and make report, and this whole provision will have to be made to-morrow by ten or eleven o'clock.

Mr. SPRINGER. I withdraw my motion to refer to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. ROBESON. I now move my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BAILEY,] to strike out so much of the resolution as refers to the admission of visitors. The resolution will be read as it will stand if amended.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to suggest to the gentleman from New York to modify his amendment so the Speaker shall issue to each member two cards of admittance, and that only persons holding these cards shall be admitted.

Mr. ROBESON. That is right.

Mr. BAILEY. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. ROBESON. I also withdraw my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Maine. The Clerk will read the resolution as it will stand if amended as proposed.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That on Wednesday, February 9, the whole east gallery shall be reserved for the use of families of Members and Senators, and their visitors, and the Doorkeeper shall strictly enforce this order. The Speaker shall issue to each family two cards of admission.

Mr. SPRINGER. That should read "member."

Mr. FRYE. No; the original order runs to the family and this may as well run to the family, no matter if some gentlemen are unfortunate enough not to have families. [Laughter.]

Mr. McCOOK. I do not wish any provision which will exclude me from the privileges accorded to any other member.

Mr. FRYE. The gentleman has all those privileges under the resolution as proposed.

Mr. McCOOK. The original resolution unquestionably did not; but what it may be after it is amended as proposed, or whether I would or would not have that privilege, I am unable to see.

Mr. BOWMAN. Can I move an amendment?

The SPEAKER. It depends upon whether it is in order or not.

Mr. FRYE. I will amend the resolution still further by adding to it the words, "to each Senator and member of the House of Representatives." [Cries of "That is right!"]

Mr. BOWMAN. The amendment I propose to offer is this, and it seems to me to be one that there will be no objection to, that as many tickets be printed as there are places in the whole eastern gallery, and divided equally between Senators and members of the House of Representatives. [Cries of "Oh, no!"]

Mr. SAMFORD. What will be the effect of the resolution as now proposed?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the result of the first resolution will set apart the whole eastern gallery for the use of the Senators and Members and their families, and this puts a limitation upon the admission of Members and Senators to two tickets, and no one would be admitted without such ticket.

Mr. FRYE. That practically does so now, in the manner in which I originally presented it.

Mr. ROBESON. I wish to ask a question, whether the whole eastern gallery is included from the reporters' line——

The SPEAKER. It is not; that is part of the southern gallery.

Mr. ROBESON. I move that the words "eastern gallery" be so construed as to include that portion of the south gallery east of the reporters' gallery. [Cries of "That is right!"]

The SPEAKER. The resolution as proposed will be read again.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That on Wednesday, February 9, the whole of the east gallery shall be reserved for the use of the families of Senators and members of the House and their visitors. The Doorkeeper shall strictly enforce this order. The Speaker shall issue to each Senator and member of the House of Representatives two cards of admission, and only persons holding those cards shall be admitted.

The SPEAKER. That gives to each Senator and Member the right to seat two persons in the east gallery.

Mr. SPARKS. It won't hold half of them.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to offer the following additional provision.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a question of order. I hope the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] will withdraw his resolution and let us proceed to public business.

Mr. ROBESON. Oh, no; if he does, I will renew it.

Several MEMBERS. Let the resolution be again read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. ROBESON. I move to amend the resolution as reported by inserting after the words "east gallery" the words "and such portion of the south gallery as lies east of the reporters' gallery." [Cries of "That is right!"]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURROWS. I wish to inquire whether it is the intention of the mover of this resolution to exclude the Delegates who have seats on the floor?

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent the word Delegates will be inserted.

There was no objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask that my amendment be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And provided that the other galleries be reserved for those having members' passes.

Mr. SAMFORD. I wish to inquire if under the resolution proposed any one else except the families of Members and Senators can be admitted?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. That of course must be on the honor of the Member or Senator himself. The Doorkeeper in such a crowd could not distinguish between those persons entitled and those who are not entitled under this resolution.

Mr. SAMFORD. I asked the question to get the construction of the Chair upon it, as there seems to be some difference of opinion among the gentlemen around me.

Mr. TALBOTT. I wish to ask a question. Suppose a member has two tickets for which he has no special use and desires to give them to some member who has more than two members in his family, would it be a violation of the order to do that?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. SPRINGER. The object of the provision which I have sent to the desk is to allow a portion of the gallery to be set apart for the use of members who desire to give passes to friends who may be visiting in the city. As it is now only a very small portion of the gallery is set apart for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was then agreed to.

Mr. FRYE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ATKINS. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. COX. Before that motion is put I desire to say to the House that on next Thursday——

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. COX. I do not propose to debate anything. I am simply making an announcement to the House. I wish to state that I will waive the question of consideration to-day if the gentleman from Tennessee desires to go on with the appropriation bill, with the understanding that I shall bring up the apportionment bill on Thursday morning next, after the morning hour.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to say——

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. ATKINS. I merely wish the same privilege the gentleman from New York had.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not wish to allow any privilege, as no debate is in order on this question.

Mr. ATKINS. I want to say, lest it might be taken as a tacit understanding on my part, if I remained silent, that I will press the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill on Thursday next. I desire to give notice to the House that on Thursday I shall endeavor to proceed with the consideration of this appropriation bill.

Mr. COX. Then I give notice that I will contest it by raising the question of consideration on the apportionment bill.

Mr. HOUSE. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. COX. I shall insist on the question of consideration to-day.

Mr. HOUSE. I understand the gentleman from Tennessee has moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider the legislative appropriation bill. Can the gentleman from New York now raise the question of consideration?

The SPEAKER. The way to raise the question of consideration under the rule would be to vote down the proposition.

Mr. HOUSE. Of the gentleman from Tennessee?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. HOUSE. All right.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. REAGAN. Is the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee merely to go into Committee of the Whole or to go into Committee of the Whole to consider a particular bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Tennessee under clause 9 of Rule XVI has the right to indicate the particular bill that he wants the House to go into Committee of the Whole to consider. The Clerk will read that clause.

The Clerk read as follows:

> At any time after the expiration of the morning hour it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills raising revenue or general appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. When the House was acting on business from the Ways and Means Committee the chairman of that committee always, without controversy, moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider the particular bill, the funding bill for instance.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to clause 7 of Rule XI, where it is provided:

> The Committee on Commerce shall have the same privilege in reporting bills making appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors as is accorded to the Committee on Appropriations in reporting general appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not denied that right to the Committee on Commerce in any particular, but merely gave preference to the Appropriations Committee because of former notice.

Mr. REAGAN. If the Chair will allow me one moment, I wish to say this: if the motion is to go into Committee of the Whole to consider a particular bill, I desire to know it that I may now antagonize it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's remedy is to try to vote down the proposition. If it should be voted down, the Chair would then accord to the Committee on Commerce the same right as is now accorded to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. REAGAN. Then I ask the House to vote down the pending proposition, and give notice that I shall thereafter move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the river and harbor bill.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. ATKINS, the affirmative vote was 109.

Mr. McLANE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. Before hearing the gentleman's inquiry, the Chair would prefer to finish the count.

Mr. McLANE. My inquiry might influence the count.

The negative vote was then counted; and there were noes 82.

Mr. McLANE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McLANE. I intend to call for the yeas and nays on this vote, but before I do so I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to know whether the ruling of the Chair upon the ninth clause of Rule XVI excludes the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from exercising its discretion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has never decided what the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union shall do.

Mr. McLANE. I understood the Chair to rule distinctly——

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not rule as to any proceeding in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. McLANE. I understood the Chair to rule distinctly that the gentleman from Tennessee had the right——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman misunderstood the Chair; and there was nothing in the language of the Chair that would give a semblance to such a proposition. The Chair rules in the House. The Committee of the Whole controls its own action.

Mr. McLANE. I beg pardon if I am not understood by the Chair; but I understood the Chair to rule that the gentleman from Tennessee had the right to indicate what bill should be taken up in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. That is right. That is in the House. The Committee of the Whole must work out its own difficulties.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Pending the announcement of the result of the vote on the motion of Mr. ATKINS,

Mr. COFFROTH, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. No. 939) to amend the law relative to the seizure and forfeiture of vessels for breach of the revenue laws.

Mr. WARD, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution and bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 388) to provide for publishing an edition of Hayden's Atlas of Colorado;

A bill (H. R. No. 4596) authorizing the survey of parts of certain townships in Crawford County, Wisconsin, and making an appropriation therefor;

A bill (H. R. No. 735) for the relief of Dr. John Blankenship;

A bill (H. R. No. 706) for the relief of A. B. Rowden;

A bill (H. R. No. 7098) making an appropriation for the flooring of the National Museum;

A bill (H. R. No. 6527) to grant to corporate authorities of the city of Council Bluffs, in the State of Iowa, for public uses, a certain lake known as Carr Lake, situated near said city; and

A bill (H. R. No. 6229) to grant the right of way for railroad purposes through certain lands of the United States in Richmond County, New York.

RELIEF OF JEANNETTE EXPEDITION.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. No. 2131) appropriating money, to be used under the direction of the Navy Department, to prosecute a search for the steamer Jeannette of the arctic exploring expedition, and move that the same be referred to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report back the same during the present week.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

TAX ON BANK CAPITAL AND DEPOSITS, ETC.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a resolution of the board of directors of the Merchants' Exchange of Saint Louis, recommending the repeal of the special taxes levied upon the capital and deposits of banks and bankers, and also the special tax upon bank checks; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

EXECUTOR OF WALTER R. IRWIN.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, recommending an appropriation of $317 for the payment of the executor of Walter R. Irwin; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CENSUS OFFICE BUILDING.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, recommending an appropriation of $5,000 for the rent of the building occupied by the Census Office; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

SPRINGFIELD ARMORY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, relative to the pay of the master armorer of the Springfield armory; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

SURVEY OF RIVERS IN NORTH AND SOUTH CAROLINA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report of the surveys of Black and other rivers in South Carolina, and of Cape Fear and other rivers in North Carolina; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL BOARD OF HEALTH.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the report of the National Board of Health for the quarter ending December 31, 1880; which was referred to the Select Committee on the origin, introduction, and prevention of Epidemic Diseases in the United States.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The vote upon the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] was—ayes 109, noes 82. The motion is agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CARLISLE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask consent that the first and formal reading of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill be dispensed with.

Mr. REAGAN. I move to take up the river and harbor appropriation bill, which precedes that bill on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the order under which the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, after which the Chair will consider and decide what can be done under that order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ATKINS moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider the bill (H. R. No. 7101) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

Which said motion was agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN. The objection I make to taking up the legislative appropriation bill at this time is that no order of the House can change the rules of the House. Under the rules the Committee of the Whole must decide its order of proceedings. The rule of the House cannot be changed by an order of the House, except by unanimous consent, or on one day's notice. The order of the House was to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the order of business in Committee of the Whole prescribed by the rules of the House cannot be changed by a simple order of the House in contravention of the rules.

I will state further that, as I understand it, the river and harbor appropriation bill stands upon the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole ahead of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. Now, I have no personal desire to antagonize the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; but in the present condition of the business of the House we consider that the river and harbor appropriation bill should be first considered and disposed of. We desire such action as will not injure public interests by defeating the bill making appropriations for river and harbor improvements.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope the Committee of the Whole will sustain the order which the House has made and take up for consideration the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. That is the great pay bill of the Government; its appropriations are to carry on the various Departments of the Government; and it is therefore a far more important bill than the river and harbor appropriation bill. I voted yesterday with the gentleman for the river and harbor appropriation bill; so far as that is concerned, I have no antagonism whatever to it. But I am unwilling that the river and harbor bill, having had its chance, should now be allowed to come in and displace the legislative appropriation bill. I hope that members on both sides of the House will agree now to take up this great pay bill which carries on all the Departments of the Government, without which there must be an extra session of Congress.

Mr. REAGAN. This river and harbor appropriation bill occupies such a position that if its consideration and passage are delayed until the third Monday of this month there will be but nine working days of the session left, and it is doubtful whether the Senate will then have sufficient time to act upon it. Besides, under the ruling of the Speaker, the chances are that the Committee on Commerce would not be recognized on that day; it could not be if the Chair should adhere to the ruling he has made. Therefore, I tell the members of this House now that in my judgment the decision we shall make upon this question will determine whether we are to have any river and harbor bill or not.

Mr. ATKINS. I think that in two or three days we can get through with this legislative appropriation bill if we work steadily at it. And certainly two or three days will not defeat the river and harbor appropriation bill, if we can get through at all.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. My point of order is that the order of the House confines the action of this Committee of the Whole to a particular bill and it has not power to act upon any other bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was about to decide the point of order, and to suggest to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] the only way in the judgment of the Chair in which the order of the House can be avoided.

It is undoubtedly true that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union bears the same relation to the House that every other committee does, and is bound just as much as any other committee is bound by any order or instruction which the House may give it. It is not in the power of the chairman of the committee, or of the committee itself, to overrule an order which the House has made, no matter what the chairman or the committee may think of the propriety of that order. Therefore, the House having resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering a particular bill, the chairman of the committee cannot lay before the committee for its consideration any other bill. If gentlemen are dissatisfied with that order of the House, a motion that the committee rise may be made and entertained; and if agreed to, then, when in the House, the order may be made that the House may resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union generally, in which event the motion made by the gentleman from Texas in regard to the river and harbor appropriation bill would be in order; or it may resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the river and harbor appropriation bill or any other bill pending in the committee. The sense of the House may be taken in that way, and when its will has been expressed the committee must obey it; and this is all that the Chair decides on the point now made.

Mr. REAGAN. I will submit that motion.

Mr. McLANE. Before the motion is made that the committee rise I desire the indulgence of the Chair, if he will hear me for one moment.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. McLANE. I submit to the Chair, not with a view especially to this question, because the gentleman from Texas has indicated his intention to pursue another course, but in view of the rules of the House and its practice, I desire to submit to the Chair——

Mr. HAYES. Has not the Chair already decided this question of order?

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman from Maryland asks permission to be heard.

Mr. ATKINS. I object.

Mr. REAGAN. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a question of order. I ask the Clerk to read clause 4 of Rule XXIII, on page 181 of the Manual.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman desire the rule to be read? The Chair has decided the question of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. This rule provides——

Mr. ATKINS. Does the gentleman appeal from the decision of the Chair? If not, I make the point of order that he is out of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have risen to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will please state his question of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. My point is that the House is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills in that committee, and that clause 4 of Rule XXIII is to govern our proceedings. I read that clause:

In Committees of the Whole House, business on their calendars shall be taken up in regular order, except bills for raising revenue, general appropriation bills, and bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors, which shall have precedence, and when objection is made to the consideration of any bill or proposition, the committee shall thereupon rise and report such objection to the House, which shall decide, without debate, whether such bill or proposition shall be considered or laid aside for the present; whereupon the committee shall resume its sitting without further order of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has just decided that if the House had resolved itself into Committee of the Whole generally, that rule would govern; but when the House has given the committee an order the committee must follow that order.

Mr. SPRINGER. The Chair will pardon me for saying that it is not in order to move to go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of a particular bill except by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. That was a question for the House; the Committee of the Whole cannot overrule the action of the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order being demanded, the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas, that the committee rise.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 68, noes 93.

Mr. REAGAN. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the motion that the committee rise was not agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN. Can an appeal be taken from the decision of the Chair? [Cries of "Too late!"]

The CHAIRMAN. Of course it is too late under the rules to take an appeal; but the Chair would be well satisfied to have the appeal taken and decided.

Mr. KENNA. I hope the gentleman from Texas will not take an appeal.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I think that under the circumstances, the committee acting under the instruction of the House to consider a particular bill, the Chair would have no right to entertain an appeal.

Mr. REAGAN. That is the very point of the question.

Mr. ATKINS. I make the point that it is too late to take an appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The point is made that the appeal comes too late. The Clerk will proceed to read the bill.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 7101) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill for information be dispensed with.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Chairman, after the waste of an hour of precious time this morning, I do not feel disposed to make any extended remarks on this bill. If the House will give me its ear, I think I can in from three to five minutes, give some idea of the differences between the present bill and the law making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the current year.

The estimates for this bill amount to $17,771,857. The bill appropriates $17,181,091. The estimates exceed the appropriations in the bill by the sum of $590,766. The appropriations proposed in this bill exceed those embraced in the law for the current year by the sum of $879,885. The appropriations for the current year aggregate $16,301,205. The increase of $879,885 in the present bill over the appropriation act for the current year consists principally of increased appropriations for the Internal Revenue Department. For salaries and expenses of collectors and deputy collectors in that department there is an increase of $50,000; for salaries of agents and surveyors and their expenses, an increase of $400,000; and for dies, paper, and stamps, $67,000, aggregating $517,000.

It is estimated that the internal revenue during the coming year will reach the enormous sum of $135,000,000, requiring additional collectors, clerks, and other employés of every description and various increased expenses to collect this additional amount of revenue. There is a considerable increase of distilleries, tobacco factories, &c.

Then, sir, the increased expenses of Congress amount to nearly $58,000 on account of provision being made for a long session instead of a short one. For the independent treasury there is an increase of a little over $50,000, of which, however, $50,000 is intended for the reissue of United States Treasury notes in place of mutilated notes that may be brought in. The appropriations for mints are increased $23,000. Then there is an increase of $33,000 for expenses of territorial governments in consequence of the repeal of the former law fixing the limit of sessions of territorial Legislatures.

When I was not here during the present session of Congress a bill was introduced repealing the act passed a few years ago which required only forty days' session for the Legislative Assembly of each Territory, and that time was extended from forty days to sixty days. This repeal was secured by reference simply to the section of the Revised Statutes, and without any other caption it went to the Senate and in the same way was passed there. I venture to say there are not ten men in this House to-day who know that law was repealed, but so it was that the law was repealed, and by this increase of the sessions of territorial Legislatures from forty days to sixty days there has been an increase of expense of $33,000, which is appropriated for in this bill.

Then we have increased the Land Office $20,000, and for surveyors-general and their clerks $15,000. The Pension Office has an increase of over fourteen thousand dollars. There is a heavy increase for the Patent Office of over thirty-six thousand dollars. We have increased the clerical force of the Patent Office thirty-three in number, and we have also provided for an increase of clerical force in the Post-Office Department of some twenty-eight. Slight increase has been made in other respects in the bill.

There are but three or four salaries in this bill that have been increased. In the first place, we have created one new office. The officer, however, was discharging his duties before, but he was paid in a different way from that which we now provide. We have put upon the regular roll what is called a Government actuary. The officer has been in existence for several years, but paid out of the appropriation for the standard silver dollar. We now put him on the regular roll at a salary of $2,000 a year. He is deemed a necessary officer by the Secretary of the Treasury and other officers of the Government.

We have put back the salary of the Auditor of Railroads to $5,000, the sum at which it was fixed in the Thurman bill. It was reduced to $3,600 in one of the appropriation bills. The committee are satisfied that the duties of that officer are so important to the Government, he having charge of the accounts of the various railroads to which the Government has given aid, amounting to over one hundred million dollars in which the Government is interested in these various roads, we feel it is important we should put this man back to the former salary for the reason that he is rather an expert than otherwise. We have also given an increased salary to his engineer. His present engineer gets $2,000, and we have increased it to $3,000. For the same reason we have increased the salary of the Auditor of Railroads from $3,600 to $5,000. I believe these are the particular points wherein this bill changes the former appropriation bill. We have increased the salary of the chief clerk of the First Assistant of the Post-Office Department, who has been in service for fifty years. He began his public service in the same position which he now holds some fifty years ago under General Jackson, and he has been there ever since through every successive administration no matter what the politics may have been. For that venerable Mr. Marr we have provided that his salary shall be $2,500 in the future; and these are the only changes. I believe I have stated the material difference between this bill and the present law.

The CHAIRMAN. If no other member desires to address the committee in general discussion the bill will now be read by paragraphs for amendment.

Mr. ATHERTON. If no other member has done so I wish to reserve all points of order.

The CHAIRMAN. That has already been done.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full compensation for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, for the objects hereinafter expressed, namely:

LEGISLATIVE.

Senate:

For compensation of Senators, $380,000.

Mr. DIBRELL. I offer an amendment, Mr. Chairman, to go in there, covering the Senate as well as the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "dollars," in line 11, insert the following:

"Provided, That no Senator or Representative in Congress shall be paid his monthly salary during any session of Congress until he shall have certified to the Clerk of the Senate or Sergeant-at-Arms of the House that he has not been absent from the sittings of the Senate or House during the time for which he demands pay, except on account of sickness of himself or family; and all absence, otherwise than for sickness, shall be deducted from the monthly pay of said Senator or Representative."

Mr. ATKINS. I believe that is the law now, but I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. DIBRELL. The law is they shall not have compensation for absence, but this requires the Sergeant-at-Arms or Clerk of the Senate to deduct it from their pay. It will save $100,000 a year, as every man knows.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I suggest by the terms of that amendment if a member were absent under the order of the House he would have to make the same certificate before he could receive his money.

Mr. DIBRELL. He is doing his duty as a member of Congress when absent under the order of the House, and therefore it does not apply to him at all.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Will the gentleman amend by saying absent by order of the House?

Mr. KEIFER. Absent on duty, you mean.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Of course; absent on duty.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Not by leave of the House.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Absent by order of the House.

Mr. CLYMER. The order of the House is the leave of the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. That ought to be amended by inserting "by leave of the House."

Mr. DIBRELL. I object to that amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. This is substantially the law as it now exists. If you make it as stringent as it is here it will not be enforced. If you intend to let this operate upon members who are habitually absent, (and I presume that is the intention of it,) it should be worded so as to reach their cases; but the House would still have the right to grant leave of absence to its members. There are members who with the approbation of their constituents could obtain the leave of the House to their temporary absence. That should not be deducted then.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as to the misuse of the term sickness. That has become a great abuse. What is meant by sickness? What is to be understood as covering that term? When we have a call of the House at nights the excuses given for absent members would seem to indicate that three-fourths of our members are under the care of physicians. The term sickness is entirely too loose and indefinite to apply to such a case as this; but to put in the words "by leave of the House" it would apply to all cases of habitual absence, because those members who are habitually absent are not supposed to be absent by leave of the House except in case of sickness. As worded now it seems to me the amendment is too indefinite to reach those persons whom it is contemplated to reach by the amendment.

Mr. DIBRELL. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that any member of the Senate or House would certify on honor that he was sick when he was simply at home attending to private business. That, of course, would have to be left to the honor of the member himself. It would depend entirely upon his honor in any event.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Suppose some member of his family is dangerously ill, and his absence is enforced in that way, would it be right to deduct his pay under those circumstances?

Mr. DIBRELL. Any member can get leave of absence when he wants it. That fact is well known here.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to amend the original proposition by inserting "except by a leave of the House of which he is a member."

The CHAIRMAN. The resolution will be read as it is proposed to be amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no Senator or Representative in Congress shall be paid his monthly salary during any session of Congress until he shall have certified to the Secretary of the Senate and Sergeant-at-Arms of the House that he has not been absent from the sittings of the Senate or House during the time for which he demands pay, except on account of sickness of himself or family or by leave of the House of which he is a member; and all absence otherwise than as specified shall be deducted from the monthly pay of said Senator or Representative.

Mr. DIBRELL. The amendment suggested by my colleague was "by order of the House," because he can get leave of the House, and that would enable him to draw his pay as if he were present attending to his duty.

Mr. ATHERTON. It should be so amended as to specify "by order of the House, and on official business;" and I suggest that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment already pending.

Mr. KEIFER. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to make an inquiry, whether it is proper to make a point of order against an amendment to a pending amendment to a bill? If so, then I make the point of order that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] is not in order, because it changes existing law. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee I do not think is subject to that objection. It does not change existing law, although the other amendment, I submit, does; and I wish the Clerk to read section 40 of the Revised Statutes.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of the Senate and the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House, respectively, shall deduct from the monthly payments of each Member or Delegate the amount of his salary for each day that he has been absent from the Senate or House, respectively, unless such Member or Delegate assigns as the reason for such absence the sickness of himself or of some member of his family.

Mr. ATKINS. As I suggested to my colleague from Tennessee, that is the law as it now exists.

Mr. KEIFER. Now, the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois would change this existing law, as it exempts from the operation of that section of the statute all persons who are absent by leave of the House. Therefore I think it changes existing law, and in that view it cannot be said to be in the interest of economy either. I like the original amendment.

Mr. BAKER. I do not like any of these amendments. They will not accomplish anything. If men are sent here by the people to represent them who have not a sufficient sense of moral responsibility to attend to their public duties and look after the public business entrusted to them, you cannot throw any drag-net around them to bring them in. Your proposed legislation is a skimmer that will not hold water.

The only effect will be this: it is the duty under the law of the accounting officers in making up the accounts of members to deduct for all absence. The statute provides that no pay shall be allowed therefor. That is the existing law, and yet it is inoperative; it cannot be done. The accounting officers cannot comply with it. The only way in which they can do it is to require every member before he draws a dollar to give from day to day a certificate, on his honor, on a blank piece of paper that he has not been absent, and that he has been here all the time attending to his duties in accordance with the law. These amendments would have no effect to prevent absenteeism. They would not reach that class of members who are derelict in their duties. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that unless you can require a certificate in every case, or unless you can so provide that the Sergeant-at-Arms may not pay to a member a single dollar until he presents a certificate covering the case, the law amounts to nothing in the way of addition to what we have already upon the statute-books. And if you do put it in that way, if you make it as stringent as you please, it will result simply in this: that the member who happens to be poor, as the most of us probably are on this floor, who cannot certify from day to day, as he would be required to do, and yet who is attending to his public duties faithfully, is deprived of his pay although in fact the man who is habitually absent may escape the results by technical privileges extended by the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois simply creates another exemption which is not now authorized by law, and that therefore to that extent it changes existing law and certainly is not in the line of retrenchment, and is therefore out of order.

Mr. DIBRELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to take up the time of the committee with the discussion of this proposition. It seems to be simple enough. It does not apply to members who are here in the discharge of their duties or temporarily absent for a brief time on attendance at the Departments here in the interest of their constituents.

Mr. BAKER. Let me ask the gentleman a question. How can the Sergeant-at-Arms know whether a man is here or not unless he has the certificate of that man?

Mr. DIBRELL. This provides the member shall certify; and no man who is here and attending to his duties will object to that.

Mr. ROBINSON. I believe it is the business of the members to be present in the House, and the practice of a good many is in accordance with that theory. But suppose it should happen that some gentleman who is here every single day of the session should have occasion, after the House is called to order, to step down to one of the Departments on some business as much official as his serving here, then he cannot come back and sign his name to a statement he has been here during the sittings of that day. He will withhold, if an honest man, putting his name to such a certificate, thereby forfeiting the amount of the pay for that day's service.

You are attempting to throw a net around the men who will decline to make a false statement, who will be so conscientious about it that they will not certify to their being here unless they are actually in their seats the whole time. And, besides, they will be very careful not to sign something that can be tortured into a misstatement. On the other hand, gentlemen who will be absent from their duty in this House, disregarding the duty they owe to their constituents, will in some way avoid the effect of any such certificate as that, and will draw their pay, much to our chagrin, perhaps.

I submit the law is sufficient now as it stands, and I hope we will not attempt to legislate upon this in an appropriation bill in this hasty way without consideration, cutting we do not know where, hitting ourselves where we should not be hit. There is not a full House now in this Committee of the Whole. I fancy that in the city of Washington at this moment there will be found gentlemen on the streets or at the hotels who have been here this morning. There seem to be a good many vacant chairs. Where will you draw the lines? It seems to me this would lead to absurd consequences and to matters that would annoy gentlemen that are here in good faith from day to day attending to their duties.

Mr. ROBESON. I move to strike out the last word. I agree with what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] have said. We cannot make good Representatives by legislation. Every man who is here represents his constituents, and is responsible to them for the discharge of his duty. Legislative duty is not confined to sitting always in the close air of this Hall, nor does it consist merely in being always here to vote ay or no upon any or every proposition. It includes the whole range of political reflection, of political investigation, and political action. Representatives often, when time and occasion presses, wish to investigate subjects which cannot be investigated in the immediate presence of this House. They often are required to have intercourse with officials, and to discharge official duties in other places. To themselves and to their own sense of propriety, and to their responsibility to their constituents, must this question be finally left. Do not deceive yourselves, gentlemen. You cannot make good Representatives by direct legislation, nor enforce personal duty by parliamentary resolves. The constituents of the gentleman from Tennessee or those of my venerable friend from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] may prefer to have him here for one day in the week than not to have him at all, or to have me or anybody else here every day in the week. To them let this question be referred, and let them act upon it at each recurring election, as is provided by the Constitution of their country.

I withdraw the formal amendment.

Mr. ATHERTON. If in order, I would like to offer an amendment to the amendment, the other having been ruled out of order. I would add after the words "except on account of sickness of himself or family" the words "or on official business."

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, we ought to do something to prevent the absenteeism which has been the fruitful source of spending a great deal of unnecessary time in attempts to do the business of the House. Men have been absent for the purpose of attempting to procure public office elsewhere. They have been absent in Europe two or three months at a time. Should they be paid for the time they were away on business of that kind, pertaining to their own private interests? Or should they be paid for the time they have spent abroad in seeking pleasure or in seeking something other than what the public interest demanded? If they are in the city attending at the Departments to business of their constituents, in accordance with the language of the amendment I have proposed they can certify upon their honor that they were still attending to the business for which their constituents had sent them. But if they are not absent either by reason of the sickness of themselves or of sickness in their families, or upon the business of their constituents, they are robbing the people of the money they pretend to earn.

We have been here from time to time, staying long periods, attempting to get a quorum, attempting to do the public business for which we are sent here, and our efforts have been neutralized and destroyed because men saw fit to stay away, either for their own pleasure or their private business, or because they saw fit to spend their time about the streets or in the public places of this city when they ought to be here attending to the business of their constituents.

I hope this amendment in some shape or other may prevail, and that we shall either have the benefit of the presence of the representatives of the people, or that the people shall not be compelled to pay for services that are not rendered.

Mr. ATKINS. Let us now have a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed to the amendment by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ATHERTON.]

Mr. DIBRELL. I will accept that amendment as a portion of mine, if I am permitted.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the gentleman's right. The amendment will be read as now modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no Senator or Representative in Congress shall be paid his monthly salary during any session of Congress until he shall have certified to the Secretary of the Senate or Sergeant-at-Arms of the House that he has not been absent from the sittings of the Senate or House during the time for which he demands pay, except on account of sickness of himself or family or on official business; and all absence otherwise than specified shall be deducted from the monthly pay of said Senator or Representative.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROBESON. If this amendment prevails will it be effective for any more than the present month?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that is a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. ROBESON. I wanted to know whether this is demagoging for a month only, or whether it is demagoging for a whole year.

Mr. ATHERTON. In my opinion, if there had been such a law as this so many members would not have been at home looking for Senatorships.

Mr. ROTHWELL. I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read the amendment, which was to add the following:

Provided, That all members shall be allowed an offset for night sessions and extra sessions of Congress.

Mr. REED. Gentlemen certainly will not object to that amendment.

Mr. DIBRELL. I raise the point of order on that amendment that it changes existing law.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Is it not obnoxious to a point of order to offer an amendment which will facilitate the absence of members?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will decide that point when it is raised. The Chair rules that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ROTHWELL] is not in order.

Mr. McCOOK. Do I understand the Chair to rule the amendment out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does, because it changes existing law and does not retrench expenditures.

Mr. McCOOK. I should like to hear the gentleman from Missouri on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DIBRELL] as modified.

The amendment was not agreed to, upon a division, ayes 20, noes not counted.

The Clerk read the following, under the heading "House of Representatives:"

For one electrician, $1,150; and one laborer, $800.

Mr. STONE. I move to amend by inserting after the paragraph just read that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

And all engineers and others who are engaged in the heating and ventilating the House shall be subject to the orders and in all respects under the direction of the Architect of the Capitol.

Mr. ATKINS. That is already the law. It was enacted in the last legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. STONE. It is not in this bill.

Mr. ATKINS. It has been left out of this bill, but it is the law.

Mr. STONE. I understand that every provision of the last appropriation bill does not remain permanently the law.

Mr. ATKINS. Very well; let it go in, then.

Mr. STONE. It has been suggested by the Architect of the Capitol that there might be some question about the matter if the provision was not contained in this bill. It is desirable that this branch of the service should be under his directions.

Mr. ATKINS. No matter; let it go in.

The CHAIRMAN. If it does not change existing law, it is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I want to move an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BAKER. I ask the Clerk to read the text of the last appropriation bill upon this point, in order that the committee may determine whether or not it is a continuing law.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman send it up to the Clerk's desk?

Mr. BAKER. I have it here; my impression is that it is not a continuing law.

Mr. STONE. That is my judgment about it, and that is the reason I have moved this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the provision of the last appropriation bill upon this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the electrician, together with everything pertaining to the electrical machinery and apparatus, and all laborers and others connected with the lighting, heating, and ventilating the House, shall be subject exclusively to the orders and in all respects under the direction of the Architect of the Capitol, subject to the control of the Speaker; and no removal or appointment shall be made except with his approval. And all engineers and others who are engaged in heating and ventilating the House shall be subject to the orders, and in all respects under the direction, of the Architect of the Capitol, subject to the control of the Speaker; and no removal or appointment shall be made except with his approval.

Mr. ATKINS. I think it is mere surplusage in this bill.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STONE] to insert the word "hereafter," so that it may become permanently the law.

Mr. CLYMER. I suggest to the gentleman to take the clause of the last appropriation bill.

Mr. STONE. I will do so.

Mr. ATKINS. It has been decided by the courts that an appropriation bill is a law. At the end of every appropriation bill is the provision "that all acts or parts of acts inconsistent or in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed."

Mr. STONE. I understand there have been different decisions. I will adopt the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] and move as an amendment the provision of the last legislative appropriation bill on this subject, with the insertion of the word "hereafter" after the first word "and," so that it may be a continuing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as now offered.

The Clerk read as follows:

And hereafter the electrician, together with everything pertaining to the electrical machinery and apparatus, and all laborers and others connected with the lighting, heating, and ventilating the House, shall be subject exclusively to the orders and in all respects under the direction of the Architect of the Capitol, subject to the control of the Speaker; and no removal or appointment shall be made except with his approval. And all engineers and others who are engaged in heating and ventilating the House shall be subject to the orders, and in all respects under the direction, of the Architect of the Capitol, subject to the control of the Speaker; and no removal or appointment shall be made except with his approval.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

For Botanic Garden: For pay of superintendent, $1,600; for assistants in Botanic Garden and greenhouses, and laborers, under the direction of the Library Committee of Congress, $9,900; in all, $11,500.

For improving the garden, procuring manure, tools, fuel, and repairs, and purchasing trees and shrubs, under the direction of the Library Committee of Congress $5,000.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to offer an amendment which I am satisfied will not be objected to by the Committee on Appropriations, to insert after the paragraph just read that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

And all such shrubs and plants as shall be propagated at all the greenhouses and nurseries of the Government in excess of what may be required each year for the public grounds shall be distributed in the congressional districts of the United States.

Mr. MILLS. Under a former law the superintendent at one of the gardens held that he was prohibited from distributing to citizens of the United States the excess of plants and shrubs propagated by him. He has informed me that in the propagation of those plants and shrubs for the adornment of the public grounds in this city he necessarily raises more than there is any use for in those grounds. My amendment provides only that as regards the excess of such shrubs and plants as may not be wanted here he may be permitted, on application of members of Congress when their constituents write for them, to send them out through the country. I think the Committee on Appropriations will have no objection to this amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. Is it broad enough to include both public gardens?

Mr. MILLS. It says "all the greenhouses and nurseries of the Government."

Mr. HAWLEY. I should like a little more information as to the bearing of this amendment. The gentleman from Texas has probably considered its effect; but I would prefer to provide that these gardens shall cultivate only what is necessary for the public grounds, unless in certain special cases where there may be some new development that will be of general use to the country; and that would most properly come under the direction of the Agricultural Department, which devotes itself largely to such subjects. I am a little jealous of starting out upon a new line of expenditure. The shrubs and plants cultivated in the Botanic Garden and other Government gardens are, to a large extent, different in no sense from those raised in private nurseries and gardens. People can buy them in their own localities. But if you begin the distribution of such plants and shrubs to the public, the demand upon each member will gradually increase, and he will be expected to send out, in addition to public documents, enough of these flowers and plants to supply the private garden of every man in his district with all sorts of pleasant and pretty shrubs and flowers.

If the Government is to go to any expense in the cultivation of plants, &c., not needed for the public grounds, it should be only in the direction of developing new and useful plants for agricultural and other purposes. Apart from that, the Botanic Garden and similar gardens belonging to the Government should be devoted to raising only what may be necessary for the public grounds. I am not willing to begin a new course of distribution not specially in the interest of science.

Mr. MILLS. I think the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] misunderstands the object of this amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY. Quite likely.

Mr. MILLS. The Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, who is a salaried officer, has placed under his control a certain number of laborers, and he is required to propagate a certain amount of flowers and plants for the adornment of the public grounds. In order to insure the necessary quantity—say five hundred roses—he must plant propably enough to raise under favorable circumstances 1,500. He must make allowance for the possibility of heavy losses. In a fortunate year the whole 1,500 may live; in an unfortunate year two-thirds may die. Now this amendment does not involve the extra expense of a single cent. It simply provides that when, for instance, there is an excess of roses raised, they shall not be thrown away, but if there are, say, five hundred extra roses they shall be distributed through members of Congress to the people. It is only the excess beyond the demands of the public grounds that will be used in this way.

Mr. HAWLEY. My impression is that if an amendment of this kind should be adopted, it might become the rule hereafter to raise a large excess of these plants and flowers in the Government establishments to gratify the demands of our constituents.

Mr. MILLS. The only question is whether, when there is an excess raised in these gardens, it shall be thrown away or distributed among the people.

Mr. McGOWAN. In reference to this matter I desire to say that in pursuance of a resolution of the House the Committee on Agriculture has, through a sub-committee, made investigations concerning this subject, and will be able very soon to report upon the whole question of botanical and other gardens now belonging to the Government. At the suggestion of the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, who has charge of what is known as the monumental garden, the committee are likely to recommend that the whole matter of the distribution of plants and flowers be taken away from him; that he be entirely relieved of the annoyance and trouble of the matter, and that all the gardens be concentrated under one superintendent. I trust no amendment with reference to this subject will be adopted until that report can be heard by the House.

Mr. ATKINS. I supposed the investigation referred to had reference simply to the Agricultural Department.

Mr. McGOWAN. Not at all; but to all the gardens under the care of the Government—the Botanic Garden, the Agricultural Garden, and the gardens of our public buildings and grounds.

Mr. ATKINS. It is my impression that the Botanic Garden is not under the management of the Agricultural Department. I believe there is one garden under the direction of the Committee on the Library and one under the direction of the War Department.

Mr. McGOWAN. The gentleman will allow me to state that under the resolution of the House the Committee on Agriculture was charged with the investigation of the whole subject pertaining to all these gardens.

Mr. ATKINS. I was not aware of that.

Mr. McGOWAN. That is the fact. The investigation is nearly completed; and the committee will very soon be ready to report.

Mr. ATKINS. When did that resolution pass?

Mr. McGOWAN. At the last session of Congress.

Mr. ATKINS. I have no objection at all; but I was about to say in regard to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas that its object, as I understand, is not to increase the production of these shrubs, plants, flowers, &c., but simply to distribute the excess among the citizens of the United States after the distribution has been made for the usual purposes here in Washington. For my own part, I desire to say that if I had the power I would cut up this whole system, root and branch.

Mr. HAWLEY. The gentleman hardly seems to have comprehended me. I feared that the necessary, the direct, the natural result of this amendment might be a demand for an excess every year; so that those in charge of the botanic and other gardens would calculate that they must provide an excess above the needs of the public grounds in Washington, because members would be crying out for these plants and flowers for distribution to their constituents.

Mr. MILLS's amendment was rejected.

Mr. FORT. I ask the chairman of the committee having this bill in charge to permit me to go back. In a moment I will explain why I make the request.

Mr. ATKINS. Very well, I will withhold my objection until the gentleman has made his statement.

Mr. FORT. I was called out of the House, and not present when the part of the bill to which I wish to move an amendment was passed. I have here a resolution reported from the Committee on Accounts of this House in which they recommend the payment of one month's pay to Charles Demar, a former employé of this House, and a disabled soldier.

Mr. ATKINS. It will be proper to amend the deficiency bill in that particular as it is in the nature of a deficiency, but you cannot put it in this bill for it would be out of order.

Mr. FORT. I think the proper place would be in this bill.

Mr. CLYMER. You would not get it paid until next year.

Mr. ATKINS. Is it for services already rendered?

Mr. FORT. Yes, sir.

Mr. ATKINS. Then it is not germane to this bill.

Mr. BAKER. It belongs to the deficiency bill.

Mr. ATKINS. And when that bill comes up the gentleman can offer it.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to the following in the office of the President of the United States: Private secretary, $3,250; assistant secretary, $2,250; two executive clerks, at $2,000 each; stenographer, $1,800; one clerk class 4; one clerk class 2; one telegraph operator, $1,400; one clerk class 1; steward, at $1,800; one day-usher at $1,400; one day-usher at $1,200; five messengers, at $1,200 each; two doorkeepers, at $1,200 each; one night-usher, $1,200; one watchman, $900; and one fireman, $864; in all, $32,864.

Mr. ATKINS. I offer the following amendment:

After line 380 insert:

"For the construction of an elevator in the Executive Mansion, $500, to be immediately available."

I offer that amendment, Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HAWLEY. That amount will not build an elevator.

Mr. MILLS. I make the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I am aware that it is subject to the point of order, but it has been urged on the part of a good many gentlemen, and I will not say the solicitation has been confined to the republicans. It has been urged by democrats as well as republicans that this elevator should be put in the Executive Mansion. It will be for the convenience of the inmates and I do not expect the republicans always to occupy that place. I am hopeful in four years from now we will have a good chance for it.

The CHAIRMAN. If the point of order is insisted upon the amendment must be ruled out.

Mr. HUMPHREY. If they have no better success than they have had for twenty years it will be a long time before my friends get into the White House. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. If the point of order is insisted upon the amendment must be ruled out.

Mr. ATKINS. I withdraw it if the point of order is insisted upon.

The Clerk read as follows:

Second Comptroller of the Treasury:

For Second Comptroller of the Treasury, $5,000; deputy comptroller, $2,700; five chiefs of division at $2,100 each; eight clerks of class 4; twelve clerks of class 3; thirteen clerks of class 2; twelve clerks of class 1; three clerks at $1,000 each; nine clerks at $900 each; one messenger and three laborers, in all, $98,320.

Mr. CARPENTER. I move to amend, in line 496 to strike out "five" and insert "six," so it will read "six chiefs of division;" and in line 497 to strike out "eight" and insert "seven," so it will read "seven clerks of class 4."

Mr. ATKINS. I make the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. CARPENTER. It is subject to the point of order.

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, and I make it.

Mr. CARPENTER. It seems to me if the facts in this case were understood the committee would agree to this amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope it will not be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will confine the gentleman to the point of order; but he is making an appeal to the gentleman from Tennessee to withdraw the point of order.

Mr. ATKINS. There is so little time I cannot give way. I submit the point of order, and the Chair must decide it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair of course is bound to sustain the point of order and rule the amendment out.

The Clerk read as follows:

For ice, buckets, file-holders, book-rests, labor, clocks and repairs of the same, and for care of grounds, $17,500; $10,000 of this sum to be expended for metallic shelving and file-holders in the Second Auditor's Office.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to strike out the word "metallic." It is unnecessary and will entail more cost than is desired.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I neglected to state, Mr. Chairman, in my opening remarks upon this bill that we have provided an increase of salary for the assistant treasurer at Boston of $500. I deem it due to the House that I should now make that statement. That is an additional officer whose salary we have increased. It is liable to the point of order if any one makes it; but I do not think the point of order should be made as I am satisfied and the committee are satisfied that officer is not now sufficiently paid for the responsible duties imposed upon him.

Mr. HAWLEY. Does not the statute provide $5,000?

Mr. ATKINS. It did, but it has been repealed.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Director:

Salaries: For Director, $4,500; examiner, $2,300; computer, $2,200; assayer, $2,200; adjuster of accounts, $2,000; one clerk of class 3; one clerk of class 2; two clerks of class 1; one translator, $1,200; one messenger; one copyist, $900; one laborer; making, in all, the sum of $22,120.

Mr. PAGE. I move in line 924, after the word "dollars," to insert "for an experienced and practical assayer, $2,200."

Mr. ATKINS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. BAKER. I suggest the phraseology should be to insert after the word "dollars" the words "who shall be a practical and experienced assayer."

Mr. PAGE. I accept that as a modification of my amendment.

The amendment, as modified, was adopted.

Mr. ATKINS. The hour has nearly arrived when the New Hampshire delegation desire to have the obsequies of their deceased colleague, and therefore I move, in order that may be accomplished, that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CARLISLE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration a bill (H. R. No. 7101) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

DEATH OF HON. EVARTS W. FARR.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit the following resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The resolutions will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That this House has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. EVARTS W. FARR, late a Representative from the State of New Hampshire.

Resolved, That in token of regard for the memory of the lamented deceased the members of this House do wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House do communicate these resolutions to the Senate of the United States.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased this House now adjourn.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to perform the melancholy duty of announcing to this House the death of my colleague, EVARTS W. FARR, which occurred at his home in Littleton on the 30th of November last. It was my sad privilege to be with him when he passed away. He died as he had lived, with the heroism of a noble manhood born of hope and faith.

It is no vain tribute of respect New Hampshire would fain pay to her noble and gallant son. As a member of this House, I submit he was universally respected both by political friends and foes. But it is not merely an excellent Representative at the National Capitol that New Hampshire mourns in the death of Major FARR. Among those who pressed eagerly to the front when an imperiled nation called her sons to her rescue, this man was the pride of our State, and under the flag with which we draped that hearse at Littleton he earned the imperishable gratitude of our people.

EVARTS W. FARR was born at Littleton on the 10th of October, 1840. He belonged to one of the best families of our State. His father, an honored member of the legal profession, survives him. Mr. FARR was one of eight children, and his early advantages were those of the typical New England country lad. He pursued his academic course at Thetford, Vermont, where he was graduated with honors, and went thence to college. Frank, earnest, and intelligent, the character of the boy gave true promise of the man. What might have been his fortune had he been permitted quietly to pursue his studies, we cannot tell. Destiny had assigned him a part in a stupendous drama, which was to startle Christendom. In that drama he peformed his part gloriously and well; and like many other young Americans of that eventful period, he leaped to distinction before he had reached the age of manhood.

At the breaking out of the war young FARR was a member of Dartmouth College. With characteristic decision, he turned his back upon college and his face to the field. He was the first man to enter the service from the town of Littleton, from which he enlisted in the First New Hampshire Volunteers. He served continuously from April 20, 1861, to June 4, 1865.

Soon after he entered the service he joined the New Hampshire Second; was appointed a lieutenant June 4, 1861; he was promoted to the rank of captain January 1, 1862, and while in command of company G lost his right arm at the battle of Williamsburgh, Virginia, May 5, 1862. His regiment, one of the most gallant and distinguished in the service, was then one of the four constituting General Hooker's original brigade.

As soon as his wound permitted he returned to the field, and September 9, 1862, was promoted to rank of major in the New Hampshire Eleventh. After fighting with distinguished gallantry at Fredericksburgh, Major FARR went with his regiment to the West, and participated in the siege and capture of Vicksburgh. After the capture he went south with General Sherman to attack General Johnston at Jackson, Mississippi, and during the remainder of the war served on court-martial duty, most of the time as judge-advocate.

Unquestionably his employment on court-martial duty during all the latter part of the war alone prevented his high promotion in the line. As it was, his career as a soldier was an exceptionally brilliant and successful one. In many of the severest engagements of the war he won golden laurels. In the action at Fredericksburgh it was my fortune to be near him, and no veteran of a hundred battles could have shown a statelier, loftier heroism. There was a touch of chivalry in his nature, and he was then of the age when this spirit is at high tide. His patriotism was not lost in the effervescent spirit of the cavalier; he had devotion as well as courage. Nor was his courage of that lower order, derived from excitement. It had nothing to do with rashness nor frenzy. He was cool, patient, and determined. It was the courage of Ney rather than that of Murat. In the fiercest and most disheartening fight he was never known to lose his self-command. This, with his quick decision and soldierly intuition, combined to make him a man of wonderful resources. In action or in any grave and responsible situation he never was "at his wit's end."

Another trait of a great soldier was his fortitude, his power of endurance. "No pain," writes an officer who was long and most intimate with him, "no pain that he suffered could bring a moan, no toil he encountered could dismay him, the longest and hardest march we ever made could not bring a word of complaint from his lips."

In the fight between Hooker's and Longstreet's divisions at Williamsburgh FARR's coolness and endurance came out in full flower. The fight was close, hot, and prolonged to the verge of human endurance. It rained hard, and the sufferings of the men were terrible. FARR seemed imbued with the spirit of a multitude. He demeaned himself through that weary, bloody day in a manner never to be forgotten by those to whom it was known. His valor was equaled only by his equanimity. Only breaking ranks, only the signs of yielding, could provoke his impatience. Just at the close of that terrible day he received the shot which made his empty sleeve, thenceforth his badge of honor.

What a tell-tale thing is an empty sleeve.
* * * *
It tells in a silent tone to all,
Of a country's need, and a country's call,
Of a kiss and a tear for child and wife,
And a hurried march for a nation's life:
It tells of a battle-field of gore,
Of the saber's clash, of the cannon's roar,
Of the deadly charge, of the bugle's note,
Of a gurgling sound in a freeman's throat,
Of the whizzing grape, of the fiery shell,
Of a scene which mimics the scenes of hell;
Though it points to a myriad wounds and scars,
Yet it tells that a flag of stripes and stars,
In God's own chosen time will take
Each place of the rag with the rattle-snake;
And it points to a time when that flag will wave
O'er a land where there breathes no cowering slave.
Till this very hour, who could ere believe
What a tell-tale thing is an empty sleeve—
What a weird, queer thing, is an empty sleeve?

His tastes were essentially military, and he brought to his duties in the field that energy and fixedness of purpose which characterized the man in all he undertook. He mastered the science of the camp and field in an incredibly short time, and, young as he was, became a recognized authority therein. He was a strict disciplinarian, thorough and exact in all his duties, and requiring the same of others. But he was full of considerate kindness to his men, to whom he endeared himself as the friend of all.

Prompt, brave, and responsible, he was ever at the post of duty; and in those evil days there marched not under the flag a hero of more dauntless courage, a devotee of more unfaltering faith than EVARTS W. FARR.

At the close of the war he embraced the profession of the law and at once became one of the most promising members of the New Hampshire bar. An ardent and stirring republican, he also came early to the front in the politics of our State. He held, successively, the positions of assistant assessor and assessor of his internal revenue district, solicitor of Grafton County, and a member of the governor's council. To the latter position he was handsomely elected in a district which had always been strongly democratic; and in this, as later, in his two congressional canvasses, his popularity was abundantly demonstrated. He did credit to every place he held, and his election to the Forty-sixth, and his re-election to the Forty-seventh Congress, were only in the natural course of his ascendant fortune. Of his career in this House, so sadly and so early closed, I will not speak. That I leave to others. His record is familiar to you all. Is it not one of promise?

His memory long will live, alone
In all our hearts, as mournful light
That broods above the fallen sun,
And dwells in heaven half the night.

Of the character of the deceased I propose to offer few words other than those I have already spoken. His was an open, generous, sanguine, earnest nature—such an one as "he who runs may read." Were I fully to express my own admiration for the man, I should be suspected of intemperate speech. My acquaintance with him began in the Army, where we were comrades together, and from that time our friendship was fast. He was instinct with generous and kindly impulses which endeared him to his friends and bound them to him in bonds of the strongest affection. Naturally in such a character there was that which inspired his foes with respect, and however he might dislike, no man could despise EVARTS W. FARR.

Like all of us, the man had his faults; yet he had no prominent defects, and I never knew a man whose faults counted for less as against the general strength and purity of his character. I have had much to say of his earnestness, for this I conceive was the leading factor of his strength. He was ready to take up any duty that lay before him, and to attack it with firm and sincere purpose. He followed a purpose with his whole soul and did nothing by halves. This element of his character, together with his versatility, implied large possibilities. He was a young man, and with length of days must have accomplished that of which all that he had done was but a hint. On the whole, his character was solid, well-rounded, and symmetrical; without grotesque or brilliant eccentricities, he was a very positive force.

The immediate cause of his death was a sudden and virulent attack of typhoid pneumonia. Overwork had induced extreme debility, and his system had little power of resistance. His general health had been blighted in the Army, and his empty sleeve was not the only sad remembrance, not the only legacy of woe that he brought back from southern fields. A post mortem examination disclosed the presence of chronic disease, which at best must ere long have proved fatal.

In his domestic relations he commanded the strongest affection. We will not lift the veil from that circle of crushed hearts. There is that which should be respected. There is a supreme sorrow, as one day—

There was dole in Astolat.

Major FARR was a great favorite in our State, and his name will be set among those whom New Hampshire delighted to honor. He was a most gallant soldier, a promising young statesman, and a noble, sincere man. We bespeak your respect for his memory as something we shall proudly and gratefully cherish.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, death has again visited these gilded walls and removed from our Chamber one of our most worthy and useful members. It is not my purpose to give a history of the deceased, but I shall confine myself to a few outlines that marked his life. Major EVARTS W. FARR was born at Littleton, New Hampshire, October 10, 1840. We learn that at the early age of twelve he struck out for himself, and by industry and hard toil procured the means for his livelihood and education. He graduated at Thetford (Vermont) Academy, and entered Dartmouth College with the class of 1863. But that patriotic ardor and devotion to his country and to duty that always characterized him caused him to leave college and volunteer as a soldier in the Union Army. He enlisted in 1861. For his bravery he was promoted through various grades to the rank of major. While with Fighting Joe Hooker's brigade he lost his right arm in the battle of Williamsburgh, in May, 1862. Notwithstanding the loss of his arm by amputation he continued in the Army, and served with a major's commission, participating in the battles of Vicksburgh, Jackson, Mississippi, and various other engagements, until he was appointed judge-advocate, the duties of which office he performed with marked distinction. After the war was over he commenced the practice of law at his home in New Hampshire. As a soldier Major FARR was courageous, true to his country, never faltering where duty called. To his soldiers he was kind and considerate, though exacting in the performance of every command.

Mr. Speaker, it was not my fortune to know Major FARR personally till I met him in the Committee on Pensions. I shall never forget the first time I met him in committee-room. The chairman called over the names of the committee for reports. None were ready except Major FARR. When his name was called he brought forward a large list of bills with accompanying papers and his reports. He began sorting out his reports dexterously with one hand. I then for the first time noticed he had lost his right arm; but it seemed to me that this was no embarrassment to him, for he selected his reports from other papers with as much apparent ease and facility as though he was using both hands. He read his reports to the committee, and they were all adopted unanimously.

I was struck with his familiarity with the pension laws, the rulings of the Pension Department, and the concise manner in which he stated the laws and the facts bearing on each case. I never knew one of his reports to be rejected or anywise amended by the committee. His judgment was clear and logical. He was always careful of the interests of the public; but, while at all times diligent in protecting the Government, he never permitted technical questions of law to weigh against what seemed to him to be an equitable and meritorious case. His justice was always "tempered with mercy." At times it was difficult to secure a quorum for business; several members of the committee were not regular in attendance. Not so with Major FARR; he was always prompt in attendance, and never behind with his reports.

From my acquaintance with him I was led to highly respect him as a man of sterling integrity, of ripe judgment, and great industry. I think I may truly say his abilities were far beyond the average. He was serving his first term in Congress, and his modesty, the insignia of true merit, forbade him entering the arena of every-day debate and wrangle, a means by which too many endeavor to thrust themselves in the RECORD and before the public at the expense of orderly and intelligent legislation. But he never faltered in the discharge of his duty when he saw it necessary to attack a bad measure or sustain a good one. Major FARR was a close attendant upon the sessions of the House. He was seldom out of his seat. He was watchful of all the proceedings of legislation. He seemed to comprehend instinctively all that was proposed for action, and his judgment as to the right or wrong of a measure was seldom at fault. I differed with him politically, but I am sure he acted with his party from as sincere convictions as I did with mine. There was no member of the Forty-sixth Congress whom I respected more highly than him. If I were called upon to give my measure of the man, I should say that clear judgment, a high sense of honor, an inflexible will, were his peculiar characteristics. He was also a man of generous and noble impulses.

Mr. Speaker, this occasion brings to us the solemn thought of death, of the uncertainties of all human aims, and the end of our ambition. Man like a shadow gropes for a while in the gloom of earth and vanishes. The dark cloud glitters for a moment in the lightning's glare; the thunderbolt signalizes the approaching storm. The cloud drenches the earth with torrents that rush headlong down to the eternal sea. The thunder's roar dies away in soft echoes along the distant hills. The cloud melts away beneath the effulgence of the noonday's sun. Thus the whirl of life is spent and passes into eternity. Man may dominate the earth, but it was given to One alone to conquer death.

We stand here to-day and the words that fall from our lips are licked up with the tongue of electric fire and whispered in the ears of all nations.

We span continents with iron girders and bridge them with the commerce of the world. We measure the depths of the sea, the breadth of rivers, and the distances and magnitude of the heavenly bodies. We predict with mathematical precision the course and velocity of planets, the visit, exit, and return of comets. Yet, sir, with all this power over earth and its surroundings we cannot tell the day nor hour of our existence, for death "cometh as a thief in the night."

Leaves have their time to fall,
And flowers to wither at the North wind's breath,
And stars to set; but all,
Thou hast all seasons for thine own, O Death!

Happy for us we cannot foretell his coming. Our adjournment at the last session would have been sorrowful indeed had we known that on our reassembling one seat here would have thus been made vacant. Our grief was wisely spared us to this last moment. Yet, when we see a man thus cut down in the prime of life, when the dreams of his early ambition were being realized, we are tempted to complain at what would seem to be a harsh visitation of Providence. But, Mr. Speaker, death waits for no one. The justice and wisdom of an all-wise God are far beyond human ken. To His will we meekly bow; to His commiserations and tender mercies we commend the stricken widow and children of our friend.

EVARTS W. FARR is no more. His mortal remains rest beneath the snow-mantled sod of his native State.

There shall the yew her sable branches spread,
And mournful cypress rear her fringed head;
From thence shall thyme and myrtle send perfume,
And laurel evergreen o'ershade the tomb.

How unspeakably sad it would be to close our tribute to our friend here. Can we have the heart to consign him to the cold clay of mother earth, and there leave him as food for the worms. Oh, no! no! The blessed hope of immortality forbids it.

Let earth dissolve, yon ponderous orb descend
And grind us into dust; the soul is safe;
The man emerges, mounts above the wreck
As towering flame from nature's funeral pyre.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Speaker, it is fitting that we should turn aside for a time from the business of the session, from our political contests and wrangles, from the heated discussion of disputed questions, from all the turmoil and noise and labors of congressional life, and offer up our tribute of respect to the memory of our deceased friend and brother member, and place upon perpetual record our recognition and appreciation of his character and services. It is the last thing we can do for him. For him all the petty ambitions of life, the struggle for honorable distinction, the cares, and troubles, and disappointments which beset the life of every man who devotes it to services in high position for his country, the carping and unjust criticisms of opponents, the life of work and worry, all these, which are a part of the lot of every public man lifted up into a position where he can become the target of press or person, are over for our dead friend, and can trouble him no more in that better life of never-ending rest and peace to which he has gone.

After life's fitful fever he sleeps well.

He passed away from an honorable and eventful life, and, although comparatively young in years, no one can feel that that life was not rounded out into full completeness, or mourn on his account that it has ended, although our sympathies go out to those near and dear to him, who lament his loss. All those who knew him, both in private and in his public career, realize that his State, his constituency, and his friends will miss his presence and the useful and honorable place which he occupied in the councils of the nation.

His duty in life, his obligation to his country and his people, had been honorably and nobly performed, and it is perhaps a fortunate and happy fate for a man to pass away from this world in the height of his powers, in honorable position gained by faithful service for his fellow-men and by their appreciation of his worth, deeply regretted and lamented by them, rather than in the "sere and yellow leaf" of old age, with faculties impaired, and powers of usefulness gone, so that as one sinks beneath the waters of life, he leaves scarcely a ripple behind.

Judged by what he was and what he had done no one can call the life of our friend a short one; nay, more, upon the calendar of events and marked by them alone his was a life longer by far than many a one of four-score years and ten. His life has been described by his colleague, who has preceded me; it is not for me to refer to it in detail, or to the examples of heroism and devotion to country, which it displays.

From among the quiet and beautiful hills of the Granite State he went forth to battle for his country, and there has come to us from his comrades the touching story of his heroism, manliness, and devotion to the cause, for which he was ready to sacrifice his life, and for which he probably has sacrificed his life, as much as if he had in reality given it up from musket-ball or bayonet-thrust on the field of battle. We know how early in the war he lost his arm, which was taken off at the shoulder, and how when for most men this would have been considered, and rightly considered, as an excuse from further service, and to have entitled them without further work and dangers to the honors and gratitude of their countrymen, he again left his home among the White Hills and went to the far southern country to once more endure the hardships, trials, and dangers of military life. He had well earned the reward of rest from military labors and of escape from its dangers—earned it at sad cost, but he refused to accept that reward, counting life or loss of limb, suffering, and privation and danger as nothing, if he could serve his country.

From all that I have seen and known of him; from what I have known of his life here and have heard of it as it was spent at his home among the New Hampshire mountains both before and after his military experience, I cannot but regard him as one of those martyrs of the war who has really given up his life for his country. The strong, vigorous, and rugged New Hampshire boy, reared in the bracing mountain air, where the very breezes are laden with strength and vitality, leading the healthy and hearty outdoor life of the country, came back from the wars weakened and with his vitality sapped by enervating climate or deadly miasmas or the vital waste caused by hardship, privation, and toil.

Many a soldier gave up his life on the field of battle by stroke of sword, or met an immediate and therefore merciful and happy death by rifle-bullet or cannon-ball, and we honor them, and never can honor them too much, as men who died for their country; and we place above their graves the old but never worn-out legend that "It is sweet and beautiful to die for one's country," and shall hold them in grateful remembrance through all the ages.

There was many and many a soldier who left behind him on southern battle-fields or in southern swamps when he came marching home after the war under triumphant flags the better part of his life, a vitality and strength so weakened and sapped that no cool northern breezes and no fond attentions of home could restore them, and who brought back with him the seeds of disease and weakness, so that nevermore could he know the delights of health and the mere pleasure of living, but always his life must be, if not a burden to him, yet something to be careful of, to be watched and guarded, and thus keeping him back from all that he would be or do. Many a life has thus dragged itself along through weary years since the war and has prematurely ended, when, so far as human minds can foresee, it might have had before it many years of active and happy usefulness. These men were as truly the martyrs of the war as those who had the perhaps happier fate of meeting a short and sharp shrift on the field of battle. For the one was the excitement, the honor, the glory, the swift passing away of life without suffering and without knowledge; for the other, the long and weary years, the patient endurance, the uncomplaining words, the cheerful acquiescence in a life whose high capabilities he could not improve, and that feeling of limitation of powers and of his chance to make the most of his life which want of strength and endurance always brings, and then an early and premature death, when perhaps the promise of future usefulness and advancement, the hopes of being most useful to himself and family and friends and country, are at the brightest.

I do not mean to say that the life of our friend was thus hampered and bound in by the strong bonds of bodily weakness so that he could not make the most of it, and did not achieve high and honorable distinction which any man might well be proud of, but I believe that the causes of his death lie in his services in the war, and that, so far as men can judge of what cannot be seen or known, many years of honor and of usefulness would now be before him if it had not been for what he sacrificed and did for his country. His record as a soldier, a statesman, and a citizen is a most honorable one.

My acquaintance with him commenced with the present Congress, to which we both came as new members, and, living near each other here, our acquaintance ripened into intimacy and friendship. I am sure that no one came into close contact with him or to really know him who did not feel for him respect and affection. Quiet and undemonstrative in his manners, not given to self-assertion or to show, not thrusting himself forward before the people, but content to remain quietly in the background unless he was needed and could do good at the front, the unthinking and careless world, judging only by the exterior and not caring to penetrate below the outer surface, might underrate him and not give to him credit for the qualities which he possessed; but behind his quiet manners there was a brave heart, an honest mind and purpose, deep and settled convictions of right, which no plausible arguments or specious reasons could disturb. I think one of the distinguishing traits of his character was his hatred of shams and false pretensions, whether in public or private life, in humble or in official station; his desire to go to the root of a matter, and to find out the right and the true thing; his dislike of the thin veneers and disguises plastered over political or personal iniquities, wrongs, or injustice; his wish to call things by their right names and to have the world call them by their right names and recognize them as they were; in a word, his desire for the truth, however disagreeable, unpleasant, or humiliating.

He was honest in conviction and word and action. The same desire to uphold the right which led him from his northern hills, and to give up all the comforts of home and to make sacrifices of health and limb, followed him into his public service here; and in these Halls he always sought by word and vote to do what he thought to be the right thing, and the honest, true, and therefore the best thing for the people and the country. The best policy is almost always no policy; but doing just the right thing and letting policies and the future take care of themselves, sooner or later the right triumphs, and we find that the unselfish policy of doing what is right without regard to consequences turns out to be the wisest as well as best policy.

Our friend was a man of strong convictions, earnest purposes, and of excellent judgment, forming his opinions with care, and skilled in giving utterance to them when the occasion required. Honest and incorruptible, earnest and industrious, interested in all the great questions of the day, faithful in attending to his duties here and elsewhere; a good man, a good soldier, a good statesman, pure in private life and in public life, such is his record, and such is the description and the memorial of him which we can place upon our records. Happy is he who is thus laid to rest with his life's warfare accomplished, and with the feeling in the hereafter that he has fought the good fight and has passed away loved, honored, and respected.

We followed him to his last resting-place amid the snows of the beautiful valley which had always been his home. It seemed as if the whole population had gathered together to honor him in his death even as they had honored him in his life; to offer up the last tribute of respect which they could ever pay to him; to perform for him the last sad services which they could ever render. The affectionate words of remembrance, the tearful eyes, the faltering accents, the sad faces, all showed that our friend had as deep and warm a place in the hearts and affections of the people to whom he belonged as in their honor and respect.

They gathered in great throngs to accompany in its last journey all that was left here below of our friend; to listen in the village church to the words of consolation and of praise of him who had gone out from among them never to return, and to find a sad solace in the recital and remembrance of his virtues and of his life among them from his boyhood to his death. And so almost under the shadow of Mount Washington and the Franconia range we laid him to rest amid the scenes which he loved so well, where the grand and majestic mountains, whitened to their summits with the snows of winter, look down upon his grave, and where in summer the everlasting hills whose granite summits pierce the sky keep watch and ward over the beautiful green valley where he has found his last resting-place.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, to me it is a mournful pleasure to add my heart-deep tribute of veneration and love to what has already been so fittingly said in memory of our departed comrade. I shall avoid all extravagance of eulogy. The noble and manly character of EVARTS W. FARR would be marred by any unreal adornment. And yet it is well for his living associates, so soon to follow, to bear testimony to the worth and exalted character of him whose memory to-day we honor.

Even in the rush of crowding duties here a moment's pause by the bier of a fallen comrade is not an idle ceremony. It is wise and well that for a little time at least party conflicts and even the tumult of needful interests should be hushed in such a presence. In that stillness are heard the truer voices, and to that vantage ground come purer air and glimpses of a serener sky. Partisanship is hushed, and the inspiration of generous comradeship strengthens the ties which should bind associated men in amenity and mutual trust. Amid our party antagonisms and fierce rivalries the fraternal intercourse and warm friendships, to which that middle aisle is no barrier, not only redeem the sordid littlenesses of life but ennoble true manhood.

My acquaintance and intercourse with EVARTS W. FARR are among the tenderest and most treasured recollections of this eventful Congress. In the early days of its first session we formed an acquaintance which soon grew into a warm friendship. Serving on the same committee, I had opportunity to know and admire the many noble traits of his character. His colleague has already tenderly and eloquently told the story of his eventful life—his early struggles, his later triumphs, the confidence and love of his people—and paid just tribute to his domestic virtues and recognized abilities.

Coming of sturdy New England families, EVARTS W. FARR's life attested the maxim that "the blood of descent is the prophecy of destiny." He was a type of the region from which he sprang, and of the intelligent and appreciative constituency which had laid upon him the honors he so modestly accepted and the duties he so faithfully discharged. In that section of our country education is universal, labor is justly honored, property largely distributed, and nowhere operate more fully all the great formative forces which make character, develop intellectual and moral elements, and mould nationalities. Hence that section, since the foundation of our Government, has been represented in this body mainly by men of native strength and sound learning, practical sense, and healthy patriotism—men both in mind and character self-poised and symmetrical—the natural outgrowth of such surroundings and such conditions.

One of the profoundest thinkers of this age has wisely said:

> The deeper you study history the surer you find the truly great men and their eras like threads interwoven in the tissue of the whole successive history of their race or nation. There is yet Miltiades in the atmosphere we breathe in this country, and there is Alfred in our daily doings.

And thus New England not only founded a distinctive nationalism within her own borders, but awakening latent forces, voicing the vague but irrepressible longings of the times, and organizing the formative elements of a broader future, has added impelling power to our growth, influenced our history, and being largely in sympathy with the progressive principle which in a free country passes from conscience to laws and institutions with irresistible force, has powerfully aided our national struggle into institutional existence and permanence, and now these expanding elements are as much a part of our national life as Warren and Adams and Webster are part of our national history.

These reflections suggest themselves here because a typical outgrowth of these New England conditions and these distinctive forces was EVARTS W. FARR. His colleague has spoken of him as a student, a soldier, and a citizen. How characteristic, and how touching that patriotic devotion of the boy scholar turning resolutely away from academic honors to the hardships and perils of the camp and field the very hour he knew his country needed him. No wonder he bore himself so bravely and so grandly through all that awful conflict. The nobility of his nature recognized faithfulness to duty as his supreme guide, so that even after he had lost his right arm at Williamsburgh he joined his regiment before the wound was fully healed, and with an intrepid valor which no danger daunted, no suffering subdued, no defeat disheartened, he remained in active service till in his shattered frame were fixed the seeds of disease which finally undermined the citadel of life. While his country needed his services he refused to care for his own health or safety. Indeed, he seemed to value life itself

But as he served or saved the State.

I shall never forget his look or words as he replied to me one day as to the loss of his arm. With the light of conscious triumph in his eyes, he said in a deep, soft whisper: "No; it is less than I had expected to give my country." Ah, the light of eternity alone can reveal the awful sacrifices made—willingly, proudly made—to our imperiled nation!

And though so modest as to his own claims to honor and so unselfish as to his own demands, he was intensely sensitive to the needs of his soldier comrades and deeply indignant at the wanton neglect of their long-deferred appeals for hearing and justice. Carefully and laboriously he examined the pension claims before that committee, and urged those which were just and meritorious with an honest zeal which stood amazed when he found it impossible to obtain for them the attention of Congress.

His last recorded words in this House, near the close of last session, were an eloquent plea that the soldiers of our country who had just claims not only for hearing but for help should no longer be neglected, and that the one day in each week dedicated by our rules to such claims should not be, as it had been, constantly taken for other business. His was the completeness of integrity—the very chivalry of justice. And to him it very naturally seemed that there could be no duty so imperative, no obligation so urgent, no work so welcome to the agents of the Government or the elected servants of the people as to mete out just if not generous recognition to the deserving soldiers of our country, many of whom are in dire need, helpless, suffering, but still the same men whose once stalwart arms upbore the dear old flag and whose bodies bridged the awful chasm over which the nation marched to victory and peace.

A striking trait of Major FARR'S character was his modesty. Conscious of honest, faithful service, eager only for duty, he had no hunger for mere notoriety and sought no personal advertisement. Even when fully prepared on a subject, he was wont to urge others to take the floor—a rare unobtrusiveness. Indeed, his quiet, earnest work was for a purpose and not for effect, and seemed perpetually to embody the spirit of the Persian proverb:

Words are the children of the wind, deeds are the daughters of the soul.

Absolute honesty and truthfulness were among the impressive characteristics of his nature. Not mere commercial honesty, but truthfulness absolute and honesty in the highest sense of that much embracing and grand old Roman word. Wellington in the House of Lords, just after the sudden death of Sir Robert Peel, in speaking to his memory, praised above all his "truthfulness;" an honor alike to the great statesman who merited it and to the great soldier who so fitly valued it. Well may we all remember that the gratitude and love of peoples follow only those who in the service of their country lay unstained hands

Upon the ark
Of her magnificent and awful cause.

The generous nature of our associate was full of magnanimity. Though intensely loyal and patriotic, though maimed in body and broken in health in the service of his country during the war of the rebellion, he bore no bitterness and no resentment. The magnanimity of his soul sought to embrace every citizen of our country in the bonds of conciliation and brotherhood, and his broad patriotism recognized in every State and every section parts of an indissoluble national unity.

One of the youngest members of this body, no man would have selected EVARTS W. FARR as the first who should break our circle. He was in the very morning of his usefulness and power. The dreams of youth were becoming realities, and with iron will and brave heart he was shaping them into beneficence and fame. In the midst of youth and ambition unfulfilled he has left us.

The ancient Northmen's image of death is less repulsive and more Christian than that of Christian countries. No skeleton, but a gigantic figure that envelops men in the massive folds of his dark robes. But whatever the symbol, whatever the promise of youth or the ripeness of age, Death is always sudden and solemn. He sends no herald and awaits no delay.

We know when moons shall wane,
When summer birds from far shall cross the sea,
When autumn's hue shall tinge the golden grain;
But who shall teach us when to look for thee.

Yet to the soul prepared it matters not. The "well done" is the crown of life. So long as a man dwells on earth life is but a fragment. But the close may seal the work with the benediction of changeless fruition. The career finished in honor and radiant with faith becomes a completed power and an everlasting possession.

May those of us who are left to speak and hear the tributes of this august and sad observance to our beloved associate take heed and ponder the lesson it emphasizes. May we so live and act that something of the good said of him to-day may be as truly said of us, and that death shall be to us indeed the crown and vestibule of life.

The name and fame of EVARTS W. FARR live to his family, his State, his country. He was a good citizen, a brave soldier, a faithful legislator, a true man. Works of loving purpose and noble ambition beautified a life round which will forever cluster tender and holy memories. Warm with the affections and wise with the aspirations which take hold of the life beyond, faith lends the light which clouds cannot hide nor shadows dim.

In the bosom of his beloved New Hampshire, amid the wild beauty of his native valley by the Ammonoosuck he sleeps, borne to his last rest by the loving hands of the grand old fraternities of which he was an honored member. Mount Washington, in cloud-crowned grandeur, stands silent sentinel above his grave. It shall perish. He shall live.

He has done the work of a true man;
Crown him, honor him, love him,
Weep over him tears of women,
Stoop manliest brows above him.
For the warmest of hearts is frozen,
The freest of hands is still,
And the gap in our picked and chosen
The long years may not fill.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to occupy the attention of the House with any formal eulogy of my comrade, colleague, and friend. Others who knew him intimately and well have given the particulars of his life and the analysis of his character and record in eloquent and fitting terms. It was not my privilege to know him until we met in the extra session of the Forty-sixth Congress which is now drawing to a close. I had not the intimacy that grows out of association on committees, nor were we often thrown together in social gatherings. But it was our fortune to sit near each other on the floor of the House. An acquaintance was readily formed. His age, which was nearly my own, his empty sleeve, and his Army record soon drew me toward him. I could not fail to observe his conduct and his votes during his brief service as a Representative.

At the request of his colleague, in charge of these memorial resolutions, and in justice to my own feelings, I very cheerfully place on record in a few simple words my profound respect for the memory of my deceased friend. His life was neither long nor eventful to a degree that justifies very general recognition and extended eulogy. I greatly mistake the character and taste of EVARTS W. FARR, if living he would have enjoyed unmeasured praise. He was a man of intelligence, of quick perceptions, of wonderful industry and fidelity, of rare courage in upholding his convictions, and of transparent honesty of purpose. He was a student of books and a student of men. He gave himself unreservedly to the work that he undertook. Never absent from his seat unless from necessity, he kept himself informed of the procedure of business and the merits of pending legislation. He was industrious in committee, attentive to his constituency, and extremely anxious to inform himself as to the best methods of serving his country at large as well as the State he in part represented. He was an earnest and uncompromising partisan in the true sense of that word. He believed in the great principles of his party and in its policy of administration as best for all sections of the country.

He recognized the necessity of political as well as military organization, and when out-voted for command esteemed it his duty and his privilege to march in the ranks, side by side with his comrades and coworkers. He believed in aggressive rather than defensive warfare; in advancing the right rather than in obstructing the wrong; in sowing and cultivating good seed rather than in employing his time and wasting his energies in the destruction of weeds. No one could well suspect him of swerving in the least degree from his convictions of right and duty. He was wise enough to seek more information, and discreet enough to build patiently and well by study, observation, and experience the foundation of a congressional reputation that, had he lived, must have sustained a solid structure.

His intellectual ability and parliamentary knowledge shone all the brighter in the setting of a modest self-distrust. As a boy we are told he schooled himself by his daily toil, as the brightest and best of New England boys have done. When the war broke out he was in college and among the first in the Granite State to enlist in April, 1861, as a private soldier. As a captain at Williamsburgh under Hooker he left his right arm on the field of battle. Longer service or greater sacrifice could not have been expected; but his wound had scarcely healed when he sought the front under Grant and Sherman in the Southwest with a major's commission; and not till the war closed did he quit the Army, not always in the field, but always in the line of active, faithful service. After the war as a law student, successful practitioner, trusted and honored public officer, and finally as a Representative in Congress he maintained the same heroic and unselfish character.

Others have been more conspicuous than he both in military and in civil life, but we may look in vain for a better illustration of the ideal volunteer soldier and citizen of the Republic. When danger threatened his countrymen he was first to seek and last to leave the most perilous and patriotic service. When peace came and the waste of war must needs be repaired, he was again first among the faithful in giving the best energies of a dauntless spirit and an enfeebled, crippled body to the civil service. He died in the prime of manhood, most loved and respected by those who knew him best. It is said that a pebble dropped in ocean will send its wavelets to the distant shore.

Is it too much to say that a life like that of our deceased colleague, pure, unselfish, uplifting in its aims and efforts, dropped in the great ocean of humanity, will not pass from sight without leaving behind an influence that touches the hearts and lives of generations to come? The strength and promise of our American institutions lie in the development of just such characters as that of Mr. FARR. Faithful, as I am told, to every trust confided to him, and generous in kind words and good deeds, he has done what he could to alleviate human suffering and to elevate and ennoble human kind.

Mr. HALL. Mr. Speaker, thrice during this Congress has the end of earth come to members of this House. One of our associates during each of our previous sessions, and now a third just as we were assembling here for this session, have been called from these scenes of warm contention and earnest endeavor to that unseen world to which we know we, too, are all so soon to follow.

Sudden and unexpected as were the deaths of Mr. Clark at our first session and that of Mr. Lay at our last, the news of the decease of my late colleague, Hon. EVARTS W. FARR, at his home in Littleton, New Hampshire, on the 30th day of November last, was hardly less unexpected or more appalling to his associates in this House or to his friends in his own State.

On the evening of Monday preceding the opening of this session I first learned of his brief illness through the public print, and the next morning at nine o'clock he was dead. Though the disease which was the immediate cause of my late colleague's death was so brief that his neighbors hardly missed him from the streets of the village before he was dead, I am aware that he had for months suffered from a complication of diseases which we now know must at any rate have at no remote period brought his life to a close. I very well remember how much and how patiently he suffered here from ill health during the last spring months until finally, under the earnest advice of his physician, he was induced to ask leave of absence for the closing weeks of the session and take a short sea voyage for the benefit of his failing health. I think I have never known a member of this House more constant in his attendance upon its sessions or one who seemed to feel more keenly the necessary absence of an hour than Mr. FARR, and so, troubled and too sensitive about his enforced absence, two days before the close of last session he had returned here improved in appearance and spirits, but still by no means a well man.

From a conversation with him in this Hall, perhaps the last one I ever had with him, for I never saw him after our separation last June, I learned that he was one of that great army of martyrs to their country's cause, who, spared death in battle, camp, and prison, are reserved to after years of pain and infirmity, from insidious disease fastened on the system while serving in our Army during the late civil war.

Major FARR was one of the younger members of this House, having but just completed his fortieth year at the time of his death; but those years were full of earnest effort and stirring incident, though no special privation beset his early life or remarkable opportunity opened before his maturer years.

Waiving the assistance which parental affection was always ready to afford he was always inclined, as I am informed, in his boyhood to rely on his own unaided efforts, and early showed that manly self-reliance and that spirit of independence which so characterized him in after life, by largely, if not entirely, defraying the expenses of his preparatory education at Thetford Academy, in Vermont, a seminary of good repute and large patronage, where he graduaded with valedictory honors and subsequently entered Dartmouth College in the class which graduated in 1863.

Here the war of the rebellion found him pursuing his freshman studies, the earnest, genial son of God-fearing, liberty-loving parents of the Puritan stock. The offspring of such an ancestry, he had imbibed from the daily intercourse of the home circle, from the teaching of the district school, and from the whole social and moral atmosphere that molded his character an earnest admiration for that view of life which claims complete freedom and equal privileges and opportunity in life's struggle for all.

To a mind shaped under such influences anything like classific distinction in the State or in social life, or the arbitrary enforced subservience of individuals or a race, was repugnant beyond endurance, and it was passed comprehension when any attempt was made to reconcile such a system with any code of ethics which reckoned honesty a virtue or theft an offense against fair dealing. Such views his college life was calculated to intensify.

Dartmouth College had been founded a century before, in the heart of our northern wilderness, having for its motto, "Vox clamantis deserto," the voice of one crying in the desert, and with the distinct avowal that its mission was to educate the proscribed red man in common with the sons of the white settler. With advancing years and receding forests the Indian had ceased to frequent its halls, but the comprehensive, race-wide philanthropy of Wheelock and his associates had left an abiding impress on its successive generations of instructors and given shape and direction to its mission as an educator of young men; and when the great struggle of 1861 came on, whenever it was referred to, whether among the students themselves in the recitation room, or the hall of more public discourse, there was praise of the social equality pervading life in the free States, and a corresponding denunciation of the peculiar institution which had brought on the great conflict and for the perpetuity of which the struggle was confessedly waged; and soon young FARR, with others of his fellow-students, had exchanged the academic gown for the uniform of the soldier.

Volunteering on the 20th of April, 1861, as a private, he remained in the Army down to June, 1865, when he was honorably discharged. During most of these years, excepting the brief period when he was disabled from keeping the field after the loss of his right arm in the battle of Williamsburgh, Virginia, in May, 1862, he seems to have been in battle, camp, and on the march.

By his bravery and a conspicuous exhibition of all the traits that mark the good soldier, he rose from the rank of private to that of captain in the Second Regiment, and finally to the rank of major in the Eleventh Regiment of New Hampshire Volunteers.

Returning at the close of the war to his mountain home, he set about the study of the law, and was admitted to the bar of Grafton County, New Hampshire, in 1867; at once opened an office in his native town of Littleton, and there continued in the practice of his profession down to the time of his last brief illness, excepting as he was called to places of public trust; and these calls were not infrequent, and they were conspicuously to commanding positions and places which require for their possessor that private worth and public confidence which Major FARR so fully possessed.

Having been assessor of internal revenue by presidential appointment from July, 1870, to the abolition of the office in 1873, county solicitor of Grafton County by executive appointment in 1873 and again in 1876, a member of the executive council of his State in 1876, he was elected a member of this House for the Forty-sixth Congress and again elected to the Forty-seventh Congress in November last.

To those gentlemen in this House who were so fortunate as to make Major FARR's acquaintance it will be no surprise when I say he was a great favorite with his party and the pride of our New Hampshire people. Proverbial for his honesty and his honor, his patriotism proven by his heroic service for his country, his courage on the very crest of battle attested by that empty right sleeve, a bright man intellectually and well poised every way, never descending from the highest moral plane in his daily walk and conversation, a good lawyer, the pleasant gentleman always that you saw here, the leader in every good work, it is no wonder that old men stood by him, young though he was, nor that the young were fascinated by his life, nor that all classes and ages rallied around him and made him their standard-bearer whether he would or no.

The men and women of that northern region are stern in their notions of right and wrong, and exacting of their public servants in matters of public policy; but so well had their requirements been met in his case that their affection toward him whose life we to-day commemorate was as fervid as the fires on their hearth-stones; and when his death was known there was a sense of personal bereavement among all classes which comes only when a trusted leader who is the hope and reliance of the State in the emergencies of the future falls.

As a lawyer, Major FARR had his training and passed his professional life at a bar which for many years has been remarkable for the legal knowledge and forensic ability of its members. Personally I knew little of him in his profession, but I am told that his natural vigor of intellect, aided by that perseverance and determination to excel which seem never to have failed him, very early gave him a prominent position as a lawyer, not only in the minds of community generally, but as well in the more discriminating estimate of the profession. Doubtless others were severer students of books and sharper practitioners, but none, I venture to say, took broader views of the law or made more sensible application of its principles, and no one practiced the law in a more honorable way, or more for the good of the State, or more to the satisfaction of his clients, than Major FARR.

Genius has been said to be the undue development of some one faculty at the expense of others, and all of us have seen too many instances of the like. Genius in this sense Major FARR had not, but if he had none of those shining qualities which dazzle and attract, he had all those qualities which go to make up a noble manhood well balanced and well disciplined. He was a most consistent and serviceable man, rich in good works in public and private life alike. No one was more constant in attendance here than he, none more punctual or more fearless in putting himself on the record on all questions acted on in this House. Though he took little of the time of this House in speech-making, it was neither because he was not interested in matters of legislation, nor because he was not a ready and effective debater, for no one followed our deliberations with more care than he, and he spoke with ease and an ability that attracted attention upon all subjects that interested him. Doubtless, with longer service here, he would have been found valuable in discussion as well as in consultation.

That my colleague should have been cut off ere it was the noon of life with him; when life promised so much of enjoyment and usefulness; when his hopes were so high and the endearments of that now stricken and desolate little family were so great, is incomprehensible. Reason reels at the blow; all the resources of philosophy and speculation give no solution of the mysterious Providence, and we are reminded that we are here simply the executors of another's will; that the disposition of nations and of individuals alike is not in finite hands. "For now we see through a glass darkly; but then face to face." Now, and whenever we recall our lamented brother, we will say the best we can say of any:

He has done the work of a true man.
* * * *
Never rode to the wrong's redressing
A worthier paladin.
Shall he not hear the blessing,
"Good and faithful enter in?"

Mr. BLAKE. Mr. Speaker, twice within my brief term of service in this House has the seat at my right hand been vacant. Two of our fellow-members who sat there have been taken from us by death. First, Clark of Iowa; then, FARR of New Hampshire. Both of them were "good men and true;" both of them the faithful servants of the people; both of them my friends.

It is of Mr. FARR only that I am to speak at this time. My liking for him was of no sudden growth. Until he came to this seat, I knew not even his name. And then—so soon was it after the loss of poor Clark—I was in no mood to greet him or any other with ardor; while FARR himself, as if he read my thoughts, was shy and formal. Thus were we for a time kept apart. The courtesies of our daily intercourse, however, gradually drew us together, and acquaintance ripened into friendship. When we separated, at the close of the last session, it was with words of mutual regret. During the vacation we exchanged letters, and made plans, which now, alas! are never to be realized. I had heard that he was feeble in health, but I did not foresee the end that was so near. To-day, he lies buried in one of the beautiful valleys which he loved, among the Granite Hills, and the snows of winter are heaped high above his newly-made grave.

It was not easy to become familiar with Mr. FARR. He did not "wear his heart upon his sleeve." He sought no intimacies. Strangers did not understand him. Nor did he respond quickly to their advances. There was to them—and to them, alone—an exterior of reserve; or, sometimes, a plainness of speech which repelled. And a few may have said that he was wanting in sympathy. But these knew him not. His inner self was hidden from them. To those favored ones, who, having gained the key, passed within the portal, he was frank and genial, full of sensibility, tender and loving, abundant in deeds of kindness and good-will.

Little by little did he tell me the story of his life: of his boyhood; of his efforts to obtain education; his patience and self-denial; his arduous military service; his happy marriage; his successes as a lawyer; his participation in the civil affairs of his State; and finally of his election to Congress. The whole was told with great simplicity. There was no boasting; no seeking for praise. Not a word about his distinguished bravery upon the field of battle. All that have I learned from other lips than his own. As he drew the picture for me, he had merely tried to do his duty and to do it well. In his eyes, there was nothing of merit in doing that which is required of all men alike. But the record of this short life—so pure, so useful—is at once a lesson and a legacy for those whom he has left behind.

The few flaws in Mr. FARR'S character were of manner rather than of the heart. Let us speak of his better qualities. He was modest—almost timid, and yet bold when there was occasion for boldness. Humble, yet proud of his strength when there was a wrong to be redressed or the weak and friendless were to be upborne. Zealous in behalf of a client or a cause, and yet zeal and honor went ever side by side with equal steps. Having a mind so broad that he could not be technical, he was direct always in speech and purpose. Like the Sultan Akbar, he believed that "no man was ever lost in a straight road." Hence was he without craft and without deceit. He hated a lie, and for the liar he had scorn. His early struggles had made him practical. Common sense held the scales in which he weighed all things; and honesty of the old-fashioned kind left him rich only in the esteem and confidence of his fellow-men.

When he came into this body it was with the determination to be useful. He did not wish to be conspicuous. No member was more regular in attendance. No one more watchful of the proceedings. No one more studious of the methods of legislation. None more industrious in the committee-room. None more conscientious everywhere. None firmer than he in resistance to any scheme which seemed to be unwise or unwholesome. Thoroughly in earnest about every matter, whether great or small. Devoted to his constituents, being their representative in fact as well as in name. A partisan, and intense in loyalty to his party; at the same time so true to his country as to be in a measure independent of parties and party discipline. Clear and positive in his views upon all political questions and strong in their expression; nevertheless, without rancor or bitterness toward those whom he believed to be honestly opposed to them.

It was not strange, then, that the people who sent him here were prompt to recognize his ability and his fidelity. Nor strange, that in the recent election they insisted upon his return, for further service, to the place which he had filled so well. Could he have been spared for a few years longer, I am persuaded that other and higher honors would have opened to him. And I know that he would have been found worthy of them all. It is idle, however, to speculate upon that which is impossible. His earth-work is finished. He comes to us no more. But there are some in this presence, to-day, by whom he will not be forgotten. In our hearts, his memory—like the sweet-scented branches of the pine tree and the hemlock which stand as sentinels around his grave—shall be green and fragrant forever.

Mr. SHERWIN. Mr. Speaker, I was unacquainted with the deceased member from New Hampshire until I met him here at the extra session of this Congress. The badge he wore, his empty sleeve, first drew my attention toward him, and the formal introduction which followed ripened into an acquaintance during the last session of Congress especially, sitting as he did so near me, which led me to respect, admire, and trust him. Coming as we did from wide-severed portions of the Republic, he from the shadows of Mount Washington in the valley of the Connecticut, and I from the level prairies of Illinois, we yet joined hands in this Hall, one in hope and one in purpose and desire to do that which should redound to the prosperity, the glory, the power, of the nation.

I knew nothing of his life at home. I did know that he had given one of his limbs to his country, and had loyally lavished his strength and the energy of his youth for four long years that the nation might endure an undivided republic forevermore. I can fancy that Major FARR, a student at Dartmouth, the honored alma mater of many accomplished and illustrious jurists, statesmen, orators, and scholars, when the late unhappy conflict was impending may have repeated the immortal words of New Hampshire's and Dartmouth's greatest son in the peroration to his second speech on Foot's resolution, expressing the very passion of liberty and union and converting the nation's fears for both into a prophecy, afterward to be gloriously fulfilled; and that those words, now classic, while upon the lips of Webster were but an unquenchable aspiration, were, under the exigent demands of that time, at once transmuted by him into a lofty purpose, which seized upon and impelled him to heroic deeds. Changing the majestic eloquence of the Senate into sublimest action, he helped to place the feet of the nation upon the immovable granite of Union, one and indivisible.

He showed in all my intercourse with him here that he was moved by a constant sense of duty to himself, his constituents, and his country. He was unflagging in the performance of his duties, and untiring in all the routine work which is cast upon a member of Congress. And while attending faithfully to the uninteresting, common, and exacting demands made upon him daily, he was constantly studying the intricate methods of legislation and familiarizing himself with the course of congressional business, that he might be fitted to grapple in the future with those greater and more important questions of state which are only opened to those men of experience acquired within these walls.

He had a mind of singular directness, which went at once to the marrow of a question. He was sometimes impatient at the delays of public business and longed to cut off or suppress all extraneous considerations when debating public questions and proceed directly to its consummation. Yet he was careful and cautious in all essentials.

It is not necessary for me to say that he was animated by a patriotism as broad as the banner which embraces the whole land in its folds, and as bright as are its stars. His love of country was a passion with him. His best thoughts and purposes were given to it, even as he had before given of his body and his blood, freely and without stint. An imputation upon its honor was like a personal affront to him. His country was not New Hampshire, but the Union, indivisible and grand. While he loved the granite hills upon which he was born and reared, and they were his home, those hills were comprehended in the all-embracing circuit of the Republic.

He was simple and unaffected in his manners, and easily approached by every one. Those who knew him could not but be charmed by the frankness of his address, the intelligence of his conversation, and the kindliness of temper which shone over all. A stranger even would have recognized in him a man of stern integrity and purity of life.

This man, whose life had been full of heroic experiences and strenuous living, who had set his ideals high above the ordinary levels of the world and was possessed of the vigor to successfully pursue them, had been selected by the people who knew him best to represent them in the council chambers of the nation before he had attained to the prime of his manhood.

He had acquitted himself so well in his high trusts that he had been the second time chosen by them as their Representative, but hardly had the news of his last success reached us before the wires brought the painful announcement that he was no more. Ambition was laid at rest. Death stepped noiselessly between him and the goal he had set himself. That career, which had so lately opened to him its bright promise of usefulness, for which he had girded himself, but which he had as yet hardly begun to run, was suddenly closed, and we stand by his vacant seat pondering upon the frail tenure by which man is held to the concerns of life. We cannot comprehend the wisdom which has removed him so early from the work of life which he was so well fitted to perform; but we can understand and do know that he has left with us the record of a man modest yet firm; one who loved the true and the good, and was ready to work for them; a wise legislator, a patriot, an honest man.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, after what has already been so worthily said of the life and public services of my late predecessor, but little remains for me to add. I feel unwilling, however, to let this occasion pass without paying my humble tribute to the worth of EVARTS W. FARR.

Residing near him, it was my privilege to know him intimately for twenty years and upward. As a civilian, he laid no claim to leadership, as that term is commonly understood, but he was, nevertheless, a thoroughly excellent and public-spirited citizen, possessed of good judgment and sound common sense.

From personal observation ever since he came to man's estate, I can safely aver that in every position of public trust or private confidence in which he was placed he was reliable, faithful, and efficient.

> He who does the best his circumstances will allow,
> Does well, acts nobly; angels could no more.

I concur fully in the accurate compend of his biography which has been so eloquently given by my colleagues, and will not, therefore, take the time of the House in its repetition. The people of his district, appreciating the creditable manner in which he had acquitted himself, both in military and civil life, had elected him as a member of the present Congress by a decisive majority, and honorable members associated with him upon committees, and all who enjoyed his acquaintance, can testify how worthily that honor as well as that of his re-election to the Forty-seventh Congress was bestowed by his constituents. Few men have made more friends during so brief an allotment of life, and none have left behind them fewer enemies.

Upon this occasion I can do little more than to express the sentiments of kindly regard with which my long acquaintance with Major FARR had inspired me, leaving to others, who have to-day so well fulfilled the task, to speak of those features of his career which endeared him to the people of New Hampsire, and which will endear his memory to them forever.

We listen now to the formal announcement of his death that we may, by this public demonstration, show our respect for the high office which he held, and our appreciation of his patriotism as shown on the battle-field and his faithfulness as displayed in civil life. These resolutions cannot augment the fame of the deceased, but they will show that the Republic can be grateful to those who have served her well, and that men of all parties can appreciate the qualities which illustrated and adorned his life.

The lesson of his well-spent life and untimely death cannot fail us, for the former is ever before us as an example, the latter as a warning. The spectacle of one cut down in the prime of his manhood, in the very midst of a useful and meritorious career, is one that may well make us pause in the hurry and bustle of our daily duties, to consider whether life is worth all the wear and tear and worry that we undergo for worldly purposes alone, and it brings to mind, with overwhelming force, the truth that it is not all of life to live. The pure, patriotic, and noble life of our deceased friend remains only a memory, but it is a memory which descends to his family, and kindred, and friends as a priceless inheritance, an imperishable legacy of honor.

With mingled feelings of sadness and satisfaction I move the adoption of these resolutions: sadness at the occurrence which gave rise to their introduction, satisfaction because of the opportunity afforded me to forward what I consider most appropriate action on the part of this House in commemoration of an event which has brought sorsow to so many hearts and an impressive lesson to us all.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolutions submitted by the gentleman from New Hampshire.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted; and then, in obedience thereto, the House (at three o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) adjourned.

Mr. WHYTE asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2167) to change the name of the tug-boat George I. Morris, of Baltimore, Maryland, to Queen Victoria, of the same place; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads; and I hope they will give due consideration to it.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2169) to provide for the settlement of the Ponca tribe of Indians, and for other purposes relating to their welfare; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Select Committee to examine into the circumstances connected with the removal of the Northern Cheyennes from the Sioux reservation to the Indian Territory.

NATURALIZATION OF NATIVES OF SPAIN.

Mr. WALLACE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate, if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interests, the correspondence which has recently passed between Spain and the United States in regard to the agreement of February 12, 1871, and more particularly with reference to the question of the naturalization in the United States of natives of Spain.

ADJUSTMENT OF PENSION APPLICATIONS.

Mr. INGALLS submitted the following resolution; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

Resolved, That a committee of three Senators be appointed by the Chair, to sit during the recess of the Senate, with power to employ a clerk and stenographer, for the purpose of inquiring into the state of the laws relative to the adjustment of pensions, with authority to report at the next session of the Senate, by bill or otherwise, what measures are necessary to secure the early adjudication of applications for pension.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

Mr. WALLACE. I desire to give notice now that on Friday, immediately after the morning hour, I shall ask the Senate to hear me while I submit some remarks on the joint resolution (S. R. No. 148) proposing an amendment to the Constitution changing the mode of electing President and Vice-President of the United States, which I introduced on the 20th of January last.

CALENDAR OF PENSION BILLS.

Mr. WITHERS. I desire to give notice that to-morrow morning, immediately after the conclusion of the morning business proper, I shall ask the Senate to take up and act upon the various pension bills which are upon the Calendar with favorable reports. A previous notice to the same effect which I gave I was unable to carry out, having been unexpectedly called away.

COURTS IN VIRGINIA.

Mr. LAMAR. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate, on Monday last, passed the bill (H. R. No. 6599) to change the time for holding circuit and district courts of the United States for the western district of Virginia, held at Danville, Virginia.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. LAMAR. I now move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and read the third time.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LAMAR. In line 3 of section 2 I move to strike out "the 1st of May, 1881," and insert "its passage;" so as to make the section read:

All laws and parts of laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed. This act shall be in force from its passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. EDMUNDS in the chair.) The Chair will state that the words proposed to be stricken out by the Senator from Mississippi were inserted by the Senate, as the Chair is informed, by way of amendment, and therefore the vote inserting those words would require strictly to be reconsidered, unless by unanimous consent the Senate is willing they should be stricken out.

Mr. MORRILL. Let the first section of the bill be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That the United States circuit and district courts of the United States for the western district of Virginia, held at Danville, in the State of Virginia, shall hereafter be held at said city of Danville, commencing on Tuesday after the third Monday in June and on Tuesday after the third Monday in November of each year, instead of the times now fixed by law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the words which were stricken out by an amendment in the Senate may be restored to the bill, leaving the bill in its original condition in that respect. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and this reversal of the amendment is agreed to by unanimous consent. The question again recurs, Shall the bill be read the third time.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT MUNICIPAL CODE.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to call up for consideration the resolution reported by me on Monday last from the Committee on the District of Columbia, which I suppose is properly morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee, under the rule, calls up a resolution, which will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, reported by Mr. HARRIS from the Committee on the District of Columbia on the 7th instant:

Resolved, That on and after Tuesday, the 8th of February, 1881, the Senate will take a recess at —— o'clock p. m., and meet at seven o'clock p. m., for the purpose of considering House bill No. 5541, entitled "An act to establish a municipal code for the District of Columbia," and will continue so to meet each day until the same shall have been finally acted upon by the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no right to modify the resolution as it was reported by me from a committee. I suggest, however, the propriety of an amendment, and offer to amend by striking out "Tuesday, the 8th," and inserting "Wednesday, the 9th," and in the after part of the resolution by inserting "seven and a half o'clock" instead of "seven o'clock."

Mr. ANTHONY. I suggest to my friend from Tennessee that the experiment of holding an evening session has been very often tried and very seldom has been successful. It seems to me that it would be more convenient to the Senate and conduce more to the dispatch of business if the Senate should sit until seven or half past seven o'clock continuously. The time allowed for recess is not sufficient to enable one to go down street and get dinner and return, and we can get a very comfortable dinner in the restaurant, going out two or three at a time. By continuing in session until about half past seven or eight o'clock we shall transact more business and do it in a more orderly manner than by coming up here in the evening, when it is very difficult to obtain a quorum.

Mr. HARRIS. The bill the consideration of which the resolution provides for is a bill of three hundred and thirty-five pages. The Committee on the District of Columbia believes it important that the bill should be considered. In the present condition of the business of the Senate I am satisfied that it will not be considered at this session unless the Senate will consent to hold night sessions for at least one or two, possibly a larger number of nights. I desire the judgment of the Senate as to whether the bill shall be considered at this session of Congress. Of course I have no desire to press it upon the consideration of the Senate. The committee of which I have the honor to be a member believes it to be important, if the Senate will consent, to set apart a day certain, some early day, when the bill shall be taken up. I have no desire to press upon the Senate night sessions, but I do think it important that the bill should be considered, and I ask the Senate to fix a day, an early day, at which it shall be taken up and its consideration proceeded with to conclusion, or I must insist upon taking the vote of the Senate at least as to holding night sessions for the purpose of considering it.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask a parliamentary question of the Chair. Is it in order for the Senate to direct in advance that no other business shall be done except attention to one bill until it is proceeded with under the rule which says what motions shall be in order when a bill is taken up, &c.? Can that be done without a change of that rule of the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks that the resolution of the Senator from Tennessee is in order. The Chair thinks that it is in order under the tenth rule, as making a special order, a special direction for the consideration of a particular bill, which the tenth rule provides may be made by a vote of two-thirds of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Chair have that rule read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the tenth rule.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Any subject or matter may, by a vote of two-thirds of the Senators present, be made a special order; and when the hour fixed for the consideration of a special order shall arrive, it shall be the duty of the presiding officer to lay such special order before the Senate, unless there be unfinished business of the preceding day, in which case the unfinished business shall have precedence.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Chair be kind enough to have the resolution as it now stands read again?

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HOAR. Does the final passage of the resolution require a two-thirds vote?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair, it does.

Mr. BECK. I should like to make the suggestion, for what it is worth, that we devote next Saturday, meeting at eleven o'clock, to the consideration of this bill to the exclusion of all other business. The chances are that by meeting at eleven o'clock and devoting all day to it, we shall make more progress with the bill than we would in four or five night sessions, and we can determine by Saturday whether another day will not finish it. I have never seen any good from a night session, and we can do a great deal of work by devoting the whole day Saturday to it and meeting at eleven o'clock.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to say that the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky is perfectly satisfactory to me. I wish to consult the convenience and judgment of the Senate first as to whether this bill shall be considered at all, and, if so, to notify the Senate that unless it is considered at an early day its consideration is wholly unnecessary. Unless it can be finally acted upon by the Senate within the next ten days, the bill can never be enrolled during the remaining days of this session. I am perfectly willing myself that we shall hold night sessions for its consideration. I would prefer if the Senate would take it up or proceed to its consideration on the day named by the Senator from Kentucky; but I desire to invoke the judgment of the Senate as to whether the bill shall be considered.

Mr. WALLACE. I desire to give notice that the Post-Office appropriation bill is ready and awaiting the action of the Senate. It only awaits the right of way now occupied by the pension appropriation bill, and just as soon as that appropriation bill is out of the way the Post-Office appropriation bill will be pressed. I am advised that there is debate to go on upon it, and I desire to give notice that I shall claim the right of way for the Post-Office appropriation bill whenever I can get the floor.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that if the bill in question shall be taken up and under consideration, so far as I have the power, being the person reporting it, I should certainly always consent to its being informally laid aside for the consideration of any general appropriation bill. In the consideration of that or any other bill of its character that I could control, I should always give the right of way to a general appropriation bill.

Mr. BAYARD. I desire to contribute to the judgment of the Senate by stating that the funding bill was reported back here last Friday, and except the appropriation bills—and I can scarcely except some of them—I think there is no measure that calls for diligent attention on the part of the Senate more than that bill. Therefore, I had proposed, not to antagonize any appropriation bill, but to ask the Senate to consider no bill as second in importance after the appropriation bills to the bill for refunding the national debt now about to mature. For that reason I say to my friend from Tennessee, without denying the interest and perhaps necessity for amelioration in the legislation of this District, that I consider it will be the duty of the Senate to prefer action upon the funding bill to any bill that is not strictly necessary for the support of the Government, and I shall urge that whenever the opportunity occurs. I have hoped it might be considered to-morrow.

Mr. MORRILL. It is evident, Mr. President, that we are very much crowded as to time for the business that is before the Senate. I think the motion made by the Senator from Tennessee should be accepted so far as this evening is concerned. The bill is a long one and will require much time for the reading, and I do not understand that there are more than two or three topics in the bill about which there will be much contention. I think, therefore, it will be better to have one evening when the bill can be read, and then, perhaps, accept the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky for Saturday; but, first and most important, it seems to me that we should have one evening to dispose of the long time it will require to read the bill.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, we have seventeen legislative days only after to-morrow, in this session. We have a very large number of measures before the Senate which have been matured by committees and which have been very thoroughly debated, which are of great public importance. Now, it seems to me that the Senate ought not to lay aside all those matters and to lose all the benefit which has come from the discussion and comparison of views upon them, in favor of this particular measure. This is a mere code, codifying the laws of this District, the laws which are in force, laws which are known to the courts and to the profession, and the District will not suffer from a delay of six months in enacting that code into a statute. The labor which has been employed in framing it will not in the least be lost. This document will be here at the beginning of next winter's session, all the work which is required being as valuable and useful to the Senate and the House of Representatives next winter as now.

Then, in addition to that, it contains three or four matters mentioned by the Senator from Tennessee the other day, which will give rise to a very long debate. Now, why should we crowd out the necessary discussion for maturing a pension system, which has been so largely debated so far, by addressing ourselves to the local system of taxation in the District of Columbia? Why should we crowd out the measures for the relief of the Indians, which have been discussed so fully? Why should we crowd out the Geneva award, which the Senate has debated and debated, but the bill in regard to which I hope will command nearly the unanimous support of the Senate, at any rate of a very large majority? Why should all these measures, which were introduced in season, which were brought here early in the session, and which have been so largely discussed and matured, be laid aside to enter upon and begin a discussion in regard to the tax system in the District of Columbia, and the other matters mentioned by the Senator from Tennessee—a bill which is to take four or five hours in the simple reading?

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the Senator from Tennessee, who will be here in December, can introduce this measure in December. It is true that the present bill has passed the House of Representatives, but the amendments which have been reported by our committee will be very unlikely to get through the House. They cannot in the state of their business, in my judgment, be very likely to feel that they can properly be able to give to them the discussion which matters involving such important principles will provoke.

I trust the Senate will, as the Senator from Tennessee invites their judgment, express the opinion that this matter should be laid aside till the beginning of another Congress, when we shall have ample time, when none of the matters contained in the bill will have suffered any injury by waiting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee to the resolution.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The question being put, there were, on a division, ayes 19, noes 16—no quorum voting.

Mr. ROLLINS called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask that the resolution as amended be read for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read as amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on and after Wednesday the 9th of February, 1881, the Senate will take a recess at — o'clock p. m. and meet at seven and a half o'clock p. m. for the purpose of considering House bill No. 3541, entitled "An act to establish a municipal code for the District of Columbia," and will continue so to meet each day until the same shall have been finally acted upon by the Senate.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, there is not a Senator in this body to whom I would be more courteous than the Senator from Tennessee. This bill, however, is between three and four hundred pages long, involving an entire and elaborate revision of the municipal code and government of this District. If the Senate is going to order night sessions, let it do it with its eyes open. There will be hard nights' work before us, involving every conceivable subject almost that arises in government under this bill. I am as willing to work as anybody in this Chamber; I do not think I am inclined to shirk it; but if we enter on this discussion, we have a hard and elaborate one before us. I agree that if it is to be done, it must be done at night, because there is more than enough of business that is almost imperative in its character to consume all the days between now and the close of the session. I apprehend, however, when this work is entered upon there will be very few night sessions until everybody will regret that they have been ordered. The struggle will be to have a quorum to do business at all, and great and grave questions will be passed upon in a way that they ought not to be disposed of, in a way that will make their reconsideration hereafter necessary. I do not believe that this great measure, this enormous bill, which perhaps is all right and perhaps not all right—my attention has been called to various parts of it—ought to be taken up at this session. It ought to be taken up at the beginning of a session and not considered, as it were, under duress; and, without the slightest disrespect to the Senator from Tennessee, and with every desire on my part to oblige him, I hope the Senate will not make this order.

Mr. BAYARD. I concur very largely with what has been said by the Senator from Indiana. I do not believe that this bill, an entire code of laws for the government of this District, containing 150,000 people, supplying laws for every imaginable branch of that government, can be considered properly at this stage of the session of Congress; and I think, without diminishing its importance at all, that it is comparatively unimportant to other measures which are before the two Houses of Congress, and which should meet with final action before they separate on the 4th of March.

For that reason I shall move to amend the resolution of the Senator from Tennessee by substituting instead of the name and number of the bill contained in the resolution the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt.

I frankly say that I hope the Senate will not adopt the resolution to hold night sessions. My experience in this body, not now a short one, has proved to me the difficulty, after a long day of close attention in committee-rooms and in the legislative duties of the Senate, of procuring a quorum of the Senate; and so you are constantly arrested upon some motion of importance by the disclosure that you have not a quorum and cannot compel the attendance of Senators. This has been tried, not once or twice, but it has been tried a hundred times, and after resolving to come here the measures before the Senate have been at the mercy of any individual who would demand the yeas and nays on a question that would betray by a division of the Senate the absence of a quorum, and then the bill must be laid on the table and the question go over. But if night sessions are to be had, then I do say that the funding bill should have preference to any other not one of the regular appropriation bills.

I am opposed to night sessions at this time because I do not think they are practicable; I do not think they are economical. In point of hours of labor they are not economical. I am sure that there are many gentlemen who hear me now who recognize perfectly well the difficulty of attempting to get important bills considered in the Senate upon which there ought to be debate, upon which there will be debate, at a time when every division will disclose the absence of a quorum. I put it to the good sense of the Senate that it is not well at this time to direct a night session, and I move the amendment, and I feel called upon to offer it, that House bill No. 4592 be substituted in the place of the bill named in the resolution, the number of which I ask the Clerk to read.

Mr. HARRIS. The amendment the Senator suggests is hardly in order. At all events, I shall raise the question of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair holds that it is in order. It is not a proposition to take up a bill instantly, or to amend a motion of that kind; but it is to strike out one name and number and insert another. That is the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. WHYTE. Before the vote is taken I wish to say one or two words. As one of the members of the sub-committee to whom was committed the examination of this bill, I beg to say to the Senate that the bill is the result of the work of a commission appointed under the act of Congress of 1878, providing a permanent form of government for this District. It has been very carefully prepared, it has been very carefully revised, and I am entirely satisfied that it can be disposed of in one or two days, so far as the great bulk of the bill is concerned; and I agree entirely with the Senator from Tennessee in the desire and in the necessity of having night sessions to dispose of parts of the bill to which there will probably be no objection; but I no not think we can begin to-night, and I would suggest to him to postpone the day until Monday next, and provide that from Monday on we shall hold night sessions until this bill is disposed of. If that amendment is made, I think he will have no trouble with the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. Why should not the committee strike out from the bill that which is new legislation, and let that come up in a separate way? I do not propose to permit the affirmation by the Congress of the United States of the doctrine that trust funds (and I include in those funds raised by religious bodies for the public worship of God, and whether those funds be invested in the real estate of churches or held as personal property) ought to be taxed without the most strenuous resistance, and that will give rise undoubtedly to very extended debate. The Senate voted it down on full debate two years ago, and I do not see why in a mere codification of the existing law anything that anybody thinks would be a good change of the law should be put in. New legislation and codes are inconsistent; they do not belong together in the same bill. If the committee would strike out the three or four radical changes proposed in the law and not attempt to force them through by the aid of their code, they would have no difficulty in getting their bill passed.

COUNT OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of twelve o'clock having arrived, in pursuance of the provisions of the concurrent resolution of the two Houses relative to the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, the Senate will now proceed to the Chamber of the House of Representatives.

The Senate, headed by the Vice-President and Secretary, and preceded by the Sergeant-at-Arms, thereupon proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives.

The Senate returned to its Chamber at one o'clock and forty minutes p. m.

REPORT ON HOG CHOLERA, ETC.

Mr. WHYTE. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 362) to authorize the printing of 50,000 copies of special report of the Commissioner of Agriculture relative to diseases of swine and infectious and contagious diseases incident to other domestic animals, have had the same under consideration, and have instructed me to report it back with a favorable recommendation, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS.

Mr. EATON. As this may be called somewhat of a broken day, and we have passed through a very pleasant and orderly scene, I hardly think the Senate will care to go into legislative business at large this afternoon. There is some very important business that ought to be brought up in executive session, and I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. GARLAND. Will the Senator withdraw his motion to allow me to give a notice?

Mr. EATON. Certainly.

GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. GARLAND. I wish to give notice that on Friday morning next, after the morning hour, if there is no regular appropriation bill before the Senate, I shall ask the Senate to take up and consider the bill (S. No. 2091) for reviving and continuing the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, and for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award, which was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator that he give the notice to apply to the time immediately after the conclusion of the routine business of the morning hour.

Mr. GARLAND. I will so modify the notice.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That 1,000 copies of the letter of Hon. Edward Everett, written after his retirement from the office of Secretary of State, in reply to Lord John Russell on the proposed tripartite convention relating to Cuba, be printed for the use of the Senate.

I will state that this is a brief document. When Great Britain and France proposed to the United States a convention in regard to the acquisition by either of those powers of the island of Cuba, a correspondence was begun by Mr. Everett with the English Government, when he was Secretary of State, in the usual diplomatic form of addressing a letter to our minister at London to be read to the English minister of foreign affairs. The reply of Lord John Russell, who was then the British secretary of State for foreign affairs, to Mr. Everett's letter was made after Mr. Everett's retirement from the office of Secretary of State; but Mr. Everett made a very able and interesting reply, discussing what is called the Monroe doctrine and the relation of the United States to the question of the acquisition by European powers of territory upon this continent in a very interesting manner. That, however, not being an official document, was printed as a pamphlet, and is not contained, so far as I am aware, in the official documents published by either House of Congress. There is no copy of it in the Congressional Library; there is no copy of it to be found in any of the public libraries in the city of Boston. There is a copy of the pamphlet in the Department of State. It is a very interesting and important contribution to our history, and a very interesting contribution to the material for the discussion of what is known as the Monroe doctrine. It is a brief pamphlet, which can be reprinted without exceeding the cost of the usual order, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate as one of our documents.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am not certain that it is a privileged motion, but if it be not I am quite certain that the Senate will give its unanimous consent to enable me to submit a motion to complete the purpose for which the tellers were appointed. I propose to dispose of what was proceeding, to wit, to finish the counting of the votes according to the forms of the Senate, and I submit the report of the tellers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. EDMUNDS in the chair.) The pending question is, Will the Senate grant unanimous consent that the Senator from Massachusetts have leave at this time to introduce the resolution which was read by him.

Mr. HOAR. It will take but half a minute. However, I will waive it, if the Senator from Maine desires.

Mr. HAMLIN. It would be better to waive it. Let us finish the count.

Mr. HOAR. I will waive the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts withdraws his request for the present.

COUNT OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. HAMLIN submitted the following report; which was read:

The tellers on the part of the two Houses report that they have counted the votes of all the States cast for President and Vice-President of the United States of America for the constitutional term of four years from the 4th day of March, 1881, and find that on the first Wednesday in December, 1880, the electors of all the States assembled in their respective States, being the day prescribed by law for the assembling of the electors, except the electors for the State of Georgia. That of those who assembled and cast their votes on the said first Wednesday in December, 1880, James A. Garfield, of the State of Ohio, received 214 votes for President of the United States; Winfield S. Hancock, of the State of Pennsylvania, received 144 votes for the same office.

That for Vice-President of the United States, Chester A. Arthur, of the State of New York, received 214 votes; William H. English, of the State of Indiana, received 144 votes.

That from the report of the electors of the State of Georgia, it appears that the electors of that State assembled in Atlanta, the capital of that State, on the second Wednesday of December, 1880, being the 8th day of said month, and so assembled on that day did cast the electoral votes of that State (11) for Winfield S. Hancock, of the State of Pennsylvania, for President of the United States; 11 for William H. English, of Indiana, for Vice-President of the United States.

From all of which it appears that the whole number of electors appointed to vote for President and Vice-President of the United States is 369, of which a majority is 185. Were the votes of electors of the State of Georgia cast on the second Wednesday of December, 1880, being the 8th day of said month, counted, the result would be: For James A. Garfield, of the State of Ohio, for President of the United States, 214 votes, and for Winfield S. Hancock, of the State of Pennsylvania, for President of the United States, 155 votes; and for Chester A. Arthur, of the State of New York, for Vice-President of the United States, 214 votes, and for William H. English, of the State of Indiana, for Vice-President of the United States, 155 votes. If the votes of the electors of the State of Georgia cast as aforesaid were not counted, the result would be: For President of the United States, James A. Garfield, of the State of Ohio, 214 votes; Winfield S. Hancock, of the State of Pennsylvania, 144 votes; for Vice-President of the United States, Chester A. Arthur, of the State of New York, 214 votes; William H. English, of the State of Indiana, 144 votes. In either event James A. Garfield, of the State of Ohio, has received for President of the United States, and Chester A. Arthur, of the State of New York, has received for Vice-President of the United States, respectively, a majority of the votes of the whole number of electors appointed.

H. HAMLIN,
A. G. THURMAN,
Tellers on the part of the Senate.
JNO. F. HOUSE,
RICHARD CROWLEY,
Tellers on the part of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be entered on the Journal of the Senate, if there is no objection.

Mr. HAMLIN. According to the usage of this occasion, I submit the following resolution:

Whereas the Senate having met the House of Representatives in accordance with the fifth section of the act of 1st March, 1792, relative to the election of President and Vice-President of the United States, and the electoral votes having been opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses of Congress and counted by the tellers appointed on the part of the two Houses, and it appearing that the whole number of electors appointed to vote for President and Vice-President of the United States is 369, of which a majority is 185; and it further appearing that James A. Garfield, of Ohio, had received 214 votes for President of the United States, and that Chester A. Arthur, of New York, had received 214 votes for Vice-President of the United States, which number is a majority of the votes of the whole number of electors appointed, and the same having been duly declared by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the two Houses are of opinion that the Constitution and laws have been duly executed, and that no further declaration of these facts is necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine asks for the present consideration of this resolution. Is there objection? The Chair will state to the Senate that in the form of the resolution the Chair has some doubt whether under the rules it requires three separate readings, or whether it is to be adopted like a concurrent resolution by a single vote, and will ask the view of the Senator from Maine on that point.

Mr. HAMLIN. My impression is that it is simply a concurrent resolution and does not possess the force of a law or a joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will, on the suggestion of the Senator from Maine, take that view of it and put the question directly on the adoption of the resolution, if there be no objection. The Chair hearing no objection, the question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS.

Mr. EATON. After consultation with the Senator who has in charge the pension appropriation bill, he deeming it necessary to press that measure, I withdraw, if I may do so, the motion which I made to go into executive session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business is withdrawn.

MORTON MONUMENTAL ASSOCIATION.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move to discharge the Committee on Military Affairs from the further consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 83) granting condemned cannon to the Morton Monumental Association, and I make the motion for the purpose of putting the joint resolution upon its passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The recollection of the Chair is that a motion to discharge a committee may be put immediately, and the committee being discharged it will then require unanimous consent to consider the joint resolution afterward. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana to discharge the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana now asks unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

Mr. HOAR. I now ask unanimous consent for the adoption of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to present, at this time, for present consideration, a resolution which will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That 1,000 copies of the letter of Hon. Edward Everett, written after his retirement from the office of Secretary of State, in reply to Lord John Russell on the proposed tripartite convention, relating to Cuba, be printed for the use of the Senate.

By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to say in addition to what I have already stated, that Mr. Everett in this letter states that the reply is made with the approbation of Mr. Marcy, the then Secretary of State.

The resolution was agreed to.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. VEST submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 7036) to establish post-routes; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. MCPHERSON, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Michael Fentenheime be withdrawn from the files of the Senate subject to the conditions imposed by the rule.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6532) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. HOAR, to add to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole the following:

The number and distribution of said clerks in the different offices and different Departments to be at the discretion of the President;

So as to make the entire amendment read:

To provide fifty additional examiners, and for rent for additional rooms or buildings therefor, for the Pension Office, and the number of clerks for the Pension Office and Adjutant-General's and Surgeon-General's Offices, respectively, necessary to render effective the work of said examiners, the sum of $200,000, to be immediately available, the number and distribution of said clerks in the different offices and different Departments to be at the discretion of the President.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Mr. President, the debates in the Senate upon this bill show, I think, great confusion to exist in the minds of Senators on the subject of the estimates made by the Commissioner of Pensions upon the arrears legislation and the extent of the frauds perpetrated under the pension laws. While as an individual the estimates of the Commissioner of Pensions might be of slight importance in his official capacity, these estimates are regarded as an important factor in the legislation of Congress touching all pension matters. This is so mainly for the reason that his opportunities to collect and digest data upon all matters relating to pensions are better than those enjoyed by any other officer or person.

The confusion which exists in regard to what the Commissioner has or has not estimated is employed to defeat measures now pending in Congress which cannot, in my opinion, be long postponed with safety either to the pensioners or the Government.

All the official estimates made by the Commissioner of Pensions touching the arrears of pensions legislation are the following:

I. In a letter addressed to the Secretary of the Interior February 4, 1879, ten days after the passage of the arrears act, the Commissioner stated the number of pensioners on the roll at the date of the passage of the arrears act who would be entitled each to a greater or less sum as arrears at 45,155, and estimated the total amount due them at $34,000,000.

In the same letter the Commissioner pointed out that the arrears act created great irregularities in pensions, and recommended an amendment which in his opinion would obviate such inequalities. The Commissioner estimated the amount which would be required at $25,000,000 in case the amendment recommended by him was passed by Congress. The amendment was adopted March 3, 1879. Up to November 1, 1880, 43,917 of these pensioners had been paid a total of $24,600,487.27. If the entire 45,155 pensioners are paid at the same average rate, the grand total required to pay them will be $25,293,963.66. It will be observed that these figures do not purport to estimate for any case on file not settled at the date of the passage of the arrears act, nor for any case thereafter filed.

To repeat, the commission estimated the amount that would be required to pay the arrears due to the 45,155 soldiers on the roll at the time of the passage of the arrears act, and entitled to arrears, at $25,000,000. Forty-three thousand nine hundred and seventeen of these pensioners were paid their arrears up to November 1, 1880, and the aggregate amount paid to them was $24,600,487.27. At the same rate the amount required to pay the entire 45,155 soldiers will be $25,293,963.66.

I submit that the Commissioner guessed very accurately in this matter.

II. On the 20th of January, 1881, in response to inquiries made by the Senator from West Virginia, chairman of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, the Commissioner of Pensions made an estimate of (1) the total cost of the arrears acts, (2) the total annual payments in the future, (3) the amount annually paid out on fraudulent pensions. These estimates were printed by order of the Senate. They are contained in Senate Miscellaneous Document No. 24.

This contains the first and only estimate made by the Commissioner of the amount of arrears or accrued pensions on the claims which were filed and unsettled on the 25th day of January, 1879, or which have been filed since that date, and will probably be allowed.

I am informed by the Commissioner of Pensions that, in conversation with members of Congress and others, the large amounts required to pay pensioners have frequently been mentioned; but that officer never stated nor pretended to state a particular sum as the cost of the arrears act until subsequent to June last, and except the estimate made at the request of the chairman of the Senate Committee on Appropriations the Commissioner has never given an approximate statement except that it would exceed $400,000,000.

The current statements to the effect that the Commissioner first estimated twenty-five, then fifty, then one hundred, then five hundred, then five hundred and ten, and still later seven hundred and ten millions, have no foundation.

The statement of $710,000,000 is supposed to be based upon a conversation which the Commissioner had with three members of the House Committee on Appropriations, within fifteen minutes after he had furnished to the Senator from West Virginia the estimates contained in Senate Miscellaneous Document No. 24. The recollection of the Commissioner as to that conversation is, that he gave the amount as $510,000,000, and not $710,000,000. It seems scarcely possible that within a few minutes after furnishing an official statement to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Appropriations the Commissioner would place the amount $200,000,000 higher than he had placed it in his official estimate. The member of the House of Representatives whose statement was quoted in debate the other day by the Senator from Illinois probably misunderstood the Commissioner.

III. Previous to the passage of the act of January 25, 1879, estimates were made by the Commissioner upon other bills at the request of committees having them in charge, but such bills differed widely from the present arrears legislation.

The estimate made by the Commissioner February 4, 1879, was, as has since been demonstrated, substantially correct.

Whether or not the estimate contained in the letter of the Commissioner to the Senator from West Virginia is too high or too low, or substantially accurate, cannot now be demonstrated, but the Commissioner submits it to Congress with perfect confidence that the amounts required will not be less than the amounts therein estimated by him.

Mr. PLUMB. I should like to be allowed to modify the amendment so as to make it read:

To provide fifty additional clerks for the Pension Office for the examination of applications, and the number of clerks for the Pension Office and Adjutant-General's and Surgeon-General's Offices respectively necessary to render effective the work of said first-named clerks, the sum of $200,000, to be immediately available.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. GARLAND in the chair.) There is already an amendment to an amendment pending; and a further amendment is not in order at present.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, what I am about to say would be better said by the Senator from California who has charge of the bill, [Mr. BOOTH,] but I rose to make a proposition which I hope Senators will agree to in regard to this amendment. I shall either make it or give way for him, if he will be kind enough to state what I think we both agree about.

Mr. BOOTH. I yield to the Senator to make the statement.

Mr. BECK. In thinking over in regard to this amendment, I believe I speak the feelings of the majority of the Committee on Appropriations when I say that we have no desire to pinch the Commissioner of Pensions, the Adjutant-General, or the Surgeon-General in the number of employés necessary to carry on their work efficiently; and if this amendment should now be withdrawn or if it should be voted down, I hope the Senate will agree in advance that an amendment shall be in order to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, proposed after full consultation with the Commissioner of Pensions, with the Adjutant-General, and with the Surgeon-General. On that consultation we can determine what additional force each one of these officers may need in order to do their work well, and the committee will after that is done carefully report to the Senate the information received from those bureaus of different Departments of the Government, and present to the Senate the facts relative to it, and ask such an increase of force as will do the work; and if the committee do not ask for enough, it will be legitimate when the legislative bill comes up, which provides for the employés in all the Departments, to add to it any suggestions which will secure a proper number if the committee does not grant the proper number. But it is proposed now to say that we will give $200,000 for increasing the force in two Departments of the Government, perhaps three, one pertaining to the Interior Department as the Pension Office does, one pertaining to the Treasury Department, and certainly one to the War Department, and to intrust the President with the division of this money among them. Thus the proper adjustment of the number that ought to be given to each will be taken away from the control of Congress and its committees. This will breed confusion in the adjustment of the number of employés and in the settlement of the accounts of these respective offices.

Besides, if this amendment is not attached to this bill, the bill will go back to the House, clear, free from any entanglement, the House will perhaps agree to the few amendments we have put upon the bill, and it will become a law at once. The nineteen millions of arrearages that we are compelled to give in order to have prompt action taken in the payment of pensions already adjudicated will then be granted, whereas if the bill goes to the House laden with this somewhat incongruous amendment—I mean one that is not properly attached to the bill—it will create long discussion in the House and perhaps delay the passage of this pension bill which ought not to be delayed while the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill is now up in the House, two-thirds of it I believe has been passed over, another day will finish it there, and long before this pension bill can become a law with this provision in it, the legislative, executive, and judicial bill will be here and the Committee on Appropriations can pass upon it, receive intelligent opinions from each of the heads of bureaus who are to receive this $200,000, and we can pass it before the pension bill thus laden can become a law.

Then as a matter of regularity and as a matter of economy of time, and as a matter to promote prompt action, everything is in favor of the suggestion that I am now making. I am willing, so far as I am concerned, that the Senate shall now declare in advance, if they think any question of order would lie to the consideration of this matter on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill because it involves an increase of expenditure, that this proposition for $200,000 already declared in order on this bill shall be in order on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill so that no question can be made upon it, except as to what is the true amount. That will be the true disposition of the question upon the bill that regularly provides for all the Departments.

Mr. WITHERS. In addition to what has been said by the Senator from Kentucky, and as evidence of the disposition of the Appropriations Committee in regard to this matter, I wish to state that a year ago when this question was up before the Senate, and when the same complaint was made as to the dilatory action of the Pension Bureau on applications for pensions, when the same necessity was declared to exist and an increase of the clerical force of the Pension Office, the Surgeon-General's Office, and the Adjutant-General's Office was asked, when the legislative bill was up the Appropriations Committee had the heads of these different departments before them and inquired of them what additional force was necessary in order to expedite the consideration of these claims. They stated to us the additional number of clerks that they desired, and we gave them every man they asked for. The Senate may rest assured that upon similar reports of the necessity for an increase of clerical force in order to accelerate the disposition of the pension cases, they will find no difficulty on the part of the Committee on Appropriations in according whatever may be required.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I shall vote for this amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] if it is to be considered as an amendment to this present bill; I shall vote for a similar provision to be attached to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill if it shall then be proposed; but at the same time, I shall do so without any expectation whatever that any such provision would remedy the evil with which we stand face to face to-day. The trouble is not in the inadequacy of force in the Pension Office, it is in the system by which pensions are now adjudicated. The system is not adapted to the amount of the business. It was very well when the number of pensions to be considered was small; but since they have become so large it is entirely inadequate to dispose of them.

Again, the system is vicious in its character. I had intended when the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia, the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, was before the Senate, to address the Senate somewhat fully in support of that measure; but the temper of the Senate convinced me that it was useless, and I refrained. It is not the time to discuss it now, but I cannot refrain from saying that I think this Senate has voted down, refused to consider the only practicable measure for affording any relief to the multitude of pension claimants who are clamoring for their rights. I believe that any such provision as this by way of an increased force in the Pension Office and in the Surgeon-General's Office will be just about as effective to afford relief to pensioners and to secure the speedy adjudication of their claims as to endeavor to keep back the rising sea with a broom. We stand here face to face with one alarming fact, and that is that there are 300,000 persons now claiming pensions. I know it is said that 80,000 of these claims are not live claims. In a certain sense they are. They are each one liable to be called up for re-examination; they have not gone off from the list. But suppose it be only 220,000 persons who are asking of this Government that their claims for pensions shall be adjudicated, there is the further fact that those claims cannot be adjudicated under the present system, even with this increase of force, in from less than from six to ten years. What is needed is something which shall meet the requirements of the situation. I believe that Senate bill No. 496 was adapted to meet those requirements; I believe if it had not been so contemptuously, if I may use the word, rejected by the Senate, it would have inaugurated a system which would have been satisfactory—satisfactory to the applicants, satisfactory to the Government—and which would have enabled these claims to be disposed of within a reasonable length of time.

This pressure upon the Pension Office is a thing which we cannot ignore or overlook, and, in my judgment, just so long as we fail to come up to our duty and devise some new plan by which pension claims are to be adjusted, just so long this shame and disgrace to the nation will continue, just so long men will go into their graves in despair, killed of the sickness that hope deferred brings to the heart, and just so long the widows and orphans will suffer for the want of what this nation is in honor and justice and contract bound to grant them speedily.

Thus much I felt that I ought to say, and while I am on my feet I desire to say one word about the Commissioner of Pensions. I came to the discharge of my duties as a member of the Committee on Pensions prejudiced against the Commissioner of Pensions. I had heard of these long delays; I had heard of the difficulties of proving claims in that office, and I felt, as others perhaps naturally feel, that the fault was with the Commissioner; but in the discharge of my duties as a member of that committee I have come to regard the Commissioner of Pensions as an honest, as an able, as an efficient officer. I believe he is the hardest worked officer in any Department of this Government. I believe he has borne unmerited and unlimited abuse, and borne it with true manliness and dignity.

And so, Mr. President, when I first heard of Senate bill No. 496 reported by the Committee on Pensions I had a prejudice against that bill; a prejudice which I am free to confess had been created by outside influence, the influence of those men whose craft is in danger from the passage of this bill; but the Committee on Pensions, of which I am a member, devoted nearly a year of careful thought and study to that bill, and I want to put it on record here and now that I believe no practical relief will ever be afforded to the pension applicants of this country until a bill embracing the general features of that bill is passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, somebody is responsible for the present condition of things in the Pension Office. The Committee on Pensions, it is true, reported somewhat late a bill to relieve that office by superseding the system now in operation with another one, but for some reason action on that proposition was further postponed until a few days ago. There was not time to consider properly so radical a change as that proposed. The bill was not acceptable to many who believed with the Senator from Connecticut who has just spoken that a change of system should be made. The Commissioner of Pensions is quoted as saying that he cannot use to any advantage additional force in his office, and upon that statement we are asked to permit the old system to go on for another twelve months at least. I do not propose, as far as I am concerned, to shirk my responsibility nor to put any of it off on the Committee on Pensions or the Commissioner of Pensions. If the Commissioner of Pensions does say he cannot use any more force I do not propose to accept that as conclusive. I propose to give him more force anyhow. I know well enough for the purpose of my action here that more force can be used, and can be used with the effect of expediting business in that office.

I hold in my hand a letter which I received this morning from a reputable attorney in my State, which I think shows conclusively that there is a lack of force in the Pension Office, or if not a lack of force, then a lack of a proper use of the force that is there. I will read the letter:

EUREKA, KANSAS, February 4, 1881.

DEAR SIR: It may be possible that you will remember, while here in the fall, seeing a crippled soldier who had a claim pending. I do not suppose he was the only one you saw during the campaign. But this man—William Preston—"was" a pensioner under pension certificate No. 94408, was totally disabled and had a claim for an increase of pension pending about a year or a little over. Never heard a word from it. Died November 11, 1880. So his increase, if allowed, will do him no good; but he has left a destitute widow with one child.

On the 4th of December last, I sent to the Pension Department for the proper forms or blank to make application for continuance, but, as yet, receive no reply. If by any means you could assist me in forwarding this matter, you will earn the thanks of the widow and good wishes of—

Your obedient servant,

IRA P. NYE.

Hon. P. B. PLUMB.

Section 4748 of the Revised Statutes is as follows:

That the Commissioner of Pensions, on application being made to him in person, or by letter, by any claimant or applicant for pension, bounty land, or other allowance required by law to be adjusted or paid by the Pension Office, shall furnish such person, free of all expense, all such printed instructions and forms as may be necessary in establishing and obtaining said claim.

The machinery by which this man was paid a pension stopped when he died, and his widow could only succeed to that pension by proving, among other things, the one of vital importance, that her husband died by reason of wounds or disease incurred in the line of his duty. She went to an attorney, as was proper, who wrote to the Commissoner of Pensions for the forms which, under this section of the statute, he is required to furnish on application. Two months have elapsed, and yet no reply to that application has come. Will any Senator here say that if there were sufficient clerks to do the business of that bureau the forms necessary to put the claim of that widow in the process of proof and allowance could not have been furnished, and that when the proofs had been sent in some clerk could not go to the files of the office and take that case from them and ascertain by examination whether the proof which she furnished established the two simple facts necessary in order to put her on the rolls in place of her husband, to wit, that she was his widow and that the disease of which he died was a disease he had incurred in the line of his duty.

Mr. President, this man had become totally disabled, by reason of which fact he was entitled to an increase of pension. That does not require an examination as exhaustive and as thorough as it does in regard to the establishment of an original claim; but it requires simply testimony showing the continuance of the disease and the increased disability growing out of the same disease. I submit that if there had been sufficient force in that office to properly transact its business this man might have had the question of his increase of pension passed upon and settled before he died, and also that his widow before this time might have received the forms necessary to enable her to show that she was entitled to the continuance of the pension which had been granted to her husband.

If Congress will not adopt a new system, and if the Commissioner will not consent to make use of the one he has, are we simply to sit here and say we shall do nothing? Are we to say that pension claims shall continue to accumulate, and that the applicants shall continue to die without any practical effort being made to enable them to get that which the Government confessedly owes them? Are these widows in Kansas and elsewhere to be postponed months and months because the forms which are necessary, and which the Commissioner is required to furnish, cannot be forwarded to them when applied for? One such case as this is sufficient of itself, if it be well attested, to require action, on the part of Congress, with reference to the force of that bureau. It is not for me to say it is the fault of the head of the bureau; and I have not in this debate attacked the Commissioner of Pensions. I do not assume to know whether he is the best person who could be there or not. But I say that getting behind the skirts of the Commissioner of Pensions will not relieve Congress from its plain duty in the premises. Somebody must take the responsibility. If the Commissioner will not, the legislative authority of the Government must, and in some way this great scandal must be removed.

This is not, as was suggested by the Senator from Kentucky yesterday, a party question. It is not a political question. It can never become so unless we make it so by continuing to obstruct the operations of the Pension Bureau so that the men who are waiting there for their pensions, and who have the great body of the loyal soldiery of the United States sympathizing with them, shall rise up with a power which cannot be resisted, which will be potential, and compel the doing of something either through party machinery or other machinery adapted for the purpose. We can make it a party question; we can make it a question which will be seized upon by persons desirous of catching any mood of the public mind for the purpose of getting into power, by pursuing the obstructive policy we have pursued for the last few years. But if we give to these men who say they are entitled to pensions a hearing, that disposes at once of the whole question, and there is no longer chance for an issue. I shall not be jealous of the democratic Congress that may do this act of justice, and how could the doing of it result in favor of the republican party?

Attention is being turned to this obstruction and denial of justice from all quarters. Every member of Congress is plied with letters showing the delay, and the suffering growing out of the delay, which results from the administration of the present system. The complaints are increasing in volume; the sentiment of the country is being aroused. One such instance in a single county as that which is portrayed in the letter I have read, will rouse that entire neighborhood, and it becomes for the time being an issue, and an issue to some extent in politics. Remove the issue by removing the cause for it; give to the widows, give to the pensioners of both sexes and of all degrees and kinds that to which they are entitled, and take the question out of politics by taking it out of consideration. This is not only the dictate of justice, but of policy as well. It cannot be long avoided; in some way we shall have to meet it, and we shall meet it under pressure much greater next year than we are under now, and the people of this country will be quick to perceive, quick to take notice of the neglect which has characterized the action of Congress, and to counteract it with the alacrity with which the Government has met obligations less meritorious in the hands of persons not in necessitous circumstances, and to whom the Government was under no equitable obligations. One of the staple arguments used against this amendment is that frauds are perpetrated on the Government in the procuring of pensions. Because there are frauds in the administration of the law we say that the honest pensioner shall be postponed of his right; we say that we cannot devise a system whereby frauds can be prevented, or that we cannot administer the present system so as to prevent them; and consequently the great body of the pensioners now standing at the door of the Pension Office asking for their rights shall be postponed until death takes them off one by one.

Mr. President, there is no solid foundation for the statement as to frauds in pensions, and yet this cry of fraud has been the turning point of the argument in this case; not that this law cannot be honestly administered, but that it is so administered that frauds occur, and therefore the first duty of the Government is not to give to these men what they are entitled to, but is to stop the frauds, and stop them by stopping the allowance of pensions!

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator will certainly do me the justice to say that when I was up in advocacy of the adoption of the amendment which I offered, I distinctly stated as the purpose of the Senate Committee on Pensions in offering it, first, to relieve the pensioners, to secure prompt action upon their cases, that that was the primary purpose of the committee in reporting the bill and their anxious desire; the detection of frauds was secondary, a consideration incidental thereto.

Mr. PLUMB. I spoke simply of the course of the debate, and that that was one argument used in favor of change of system, and one of the arguments, too, which have been largely used against the adoption of my amendment.

I have said before that I do not believe that the number of fraudulent pensioners upon the rolls is anything like as great as has been stated; and I say on the authority of a high official of the Government qualified to judge, and from my own examination as well, that it is entirely competent for the Commissioner of Pensions to so administer the present law as that claims shall not necessarily be allowed ex parte—that it is just as easy for the Commissioner of Pensions to provide for such a hearing of the case of the Government as he thinks is desirable under the present law as under the law proposed by the bill reported from the committee and under consideration the other day. And I believe, Mr. President, that this law can be administered with substantial fairness to the Government and at the same time with rapidity and justice to the pensioners. I believe that to be possible, and I believe one of the necessary steps is to give additional force to the Pension Bureau.

Of course after all there will remain a great deal that we cannot do. The internal administration of that bureau of course must be lodged in the hands of somebody. Congress, perhaps, cannot intelligently revise it; but the fault to-day is not in the system, it is in the administration of it. While the pending amendment may add to it as much as would seem upon the face of it, and may not be as effective as it ought to be, we can all see readily enough that simple inquiries such as were called for by the attorney of this destitute widow, whose husband had died on account of disease incurred in the line of his duty, need not remain unanswered while she is saved from suffering by the charity of her neighbors. That is a question which we have got to meet. We must meet it, if we are to meet it at all for practical purposes, during the next twelve months. We must meet it either upon this bill or upon some other appropriation bill yet to be reported to this body.

I moved this amendment upon this bill believing it to be the proper place for it. It was in line with the general object of the bill; it related to the expenditure of the money, and it expressed my belief as to what was the only practicable thing yet remaining to be done. Now the Appropriations Committee come in and say that it will be more agreeable if moved to another bill. They have made a proposition here which is fair enough and which I am disposed to accept if there be no objection made from any other quarter, to the effect that the Appropriations Committee will put upon the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill a provision increasing the force in the Pension Bureau, and that any amendment to that or any additional proposition covering the same or any similar point shall not be subject to the point of order in the Senate.

The only objection I had to that yesterday was that I thought I foresaw that the committee now, as heretofore, would take the judgment of the Commissioner of Pensions, that we should be put in the attitude again of being invited to shirk responsibilities and put it off on the shoulders of that officer. But, Mr. President, if the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky, assented to by the Senator from Virginia, is agreeable to the other members of the Appropriations Committee, and if it be made in such a way that there can be no doubt whatever that the proposition can go in on the legislative, executive, and judicial bill, the committee proposing in the mean time to investigate this question and themselves consider some proposition for the accomplishment of the object I have in view, I have no objection to withdrawing this amendment if I may be permitted so to do, and let this subject go over until that bill comes up. And when that bill does come up I give notice now that if the committee shall be moved by the reports of the Commissioner of Pensions or anybody else to stand by the existing force or to make only a trifling addition to it, I shall feel impelled by my duty to renew the amendment which I have moved in substance, and ask the Senate to pass upon it on its own responsibility.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not intend to protract this discussion, which has already run for a considerable length. I want to say, however, that I am very much obliged to the Senator from Kansas for withdrawing the amendment. I sympathize with him most fully in the object he has at heart. I am also obliged to him for having brought the question here and called out a discussion upon it. I think it will do good.

My reason yesterday for opposing the amendment was this, and this only: I believe that the amendment proposed will not secure the object desired, and as I want to secure that object I prefer to take the other course. Why do I think it would not secure it? I know there is an opposition in the House (and I sympathize with it most fully myself) to making appropriations in the lump for the employment of clerks. I have resolved over and over again that I never would vote for such appropriations. We have made them in past years, and they have resulted very often in what was believed to be favoritism. The amendment as proposed placed $200,000 at somebody's command to employ any number of clerks he chose with that amount of money, without designating the classes of those clerks or the amount that should be paid them. I feared when this legislation was pending that if it passed in this bill and went to the House in that way it would be rejected, and I believe it would be. The next thing would have been a conference. The conferees on the part of the Senate would have had nothing to support them in asking for this amendment, no recommendations from the Department, and they would have been urging an amendment in violation of the proper principle of appropriation, namely, to designate what the money is for. The result of that would have been that the conference committee on the part of the Senate would be compelled to yield the amendment; they would have had no ground to stand upon in insisting upon an amendment in this form and under these circumstances. What would have been the result further? In the mean time, while this bill was pending in the conference committee, the legislative appropriation bill would have passed from the Senate, and as we had agreed to the amendment on this bill we would not have put in on the legislative bill. Consequently the session would have ended and nothing would have been done.

It is because I want to accomplish something in that line that I opposed the amendment yesterday and am opposed to it to-day. I will not yield to any one in my earnestness and zeal in behalf of the soldier, in supplying to him the pension he is entitled to by law at the earliest possible moment. The plan suggested by other members of the Appropriations Committee, to act upon the subject on the legislative bill, will in my judgment secure that object. This would not have done it. While I am obliged to the Senator from Kansas and believe he has done a good work in agitating this question, I am also obliged to him for withdrawing the amendment from this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Kansas that his amendment having been adopted by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and it having been reported to the Senate and a separate vote reserved upon it, in the opinion of the Chair the Senator from Kansas cannot now withdraw it, but it will have to be voted upon by the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am glad the Senator from Kansas cannot withdraw it. It can be amended so as to make it perfect, as it is in substance. It only wants a little change of phraseology. The Senate has decided the amendment to be in order. I did not think it was. The Senate thought it was; and therefore it becomes simply a question now whether we will take the earliest opportunity to provide for the means of expediting the examination of pension claims. Why we should be told that it would be more suitable on another appropriation bill than on this, I am entirely unable to understand.

The fact that the work in the Pension Office and in the War Department connected with it is greatly behind, owing to insufficient force to make examinations in the Surgeon-General's and Adjutant-General's Offices of claims filed in the Pension Office as to the record of military service and disability, I believe is agreed to by everybody. I know that among the small number of my constituents compared with the whole number in the United States who served in the armies of the Union, there is a constant complaint of men personally known to me to have been worthy soldiers and upright men—of course I do not know about their physical disabilities, whether incurred in the war or not, except in the case of obvious wounds and so on,—men whose character is just as good (and I say that to give them the highest praise) as that of any Senator in this body, write to me day after day complaining that years in some instances have elapsed, long before the arrears matter made any temptation to anybody, since their pension claims were filed, since they had furnished all the proofs that the regulations appeared to require, and yet they could not get them disposed of either pro or con. I immediately proceed to write to the Commissioner of Pensions, who gives me this reason or that reason, usually apparently a good one, and usually not the fault of the pension applicant. The most common one is that it is awaiting a report from the War Department, which was asked for so many months ago, very often a great many months ago, and so on.

Now I do say, inasmuch as we are committed, and committed so far as pensions in general are concerned upon sound and right principles, to making this recognition according to what we held out in our statutes to the disabled soldiers of the Union, that it is a crying shame that the good cannot be sifted out from the bad within the lifetime of the good cases, most of which are those of persons who from day to day need this little sum that they would not have needed but for their service to their country, and in respect of whom it is a poor consolation to go down hungry and sorrowful into the grave and be told that by and by the thing will be worked through.

Therefore, it having been decided to be in order, I shall vote to make whatever provision we can upon this bill for expediting these investigations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole originally proposed by the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.]

Mr. BOOTH. I move to lay the entire amendment on the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How can you do that with an amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. BOOTH. If it cannot be done I do not do it; I want to do it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You cannot do it; the amendment is in possession of the Senate. I suggest that point to the Chair; I never thought of it before.

Mr. BOOTH. I will take the opinion of the Chair; but the amendment has not been concurred in in the Senate.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I suggest that the amendment be withdrawn by the unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. WITHERS. Will the Senator from Vermont indicate the rule which forbids the laying of an amendment upon the table in the Senate?

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator addressed himself to me, I did not hear him.

Mr. WITHERS. I understood the Senator from Vermont to say that a motion to lay an amendment upon the table could not be made in the Senate, but only in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, I raised the point of order for the consideration of the Chair, because it is a new point to me, that this amendment having been received and considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, (not a Committee of the Whole,) and having been agreed to in committee, in this stage it is not in order to move to lay it on the table, and my first impression is that the point is a good one, but as I say it is a new suggestion.

Mr. WITHERS. The amendment was reserved, and notice was given that a separate vote in the Senate would be taken on this amendment. Therefore the whole thing is within the control of the Senate, and they can dispose of it under any of the ordinary principles of parliamentary law. So it seems to me.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, but it is an amendment that has been agreed upon by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and a separate vote has been reserved upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair it is an amendment subject to all the rules applying to amendments, and if that be so the Chair will rule that the motion to lay it on the table is in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know but that the Chair is right; I am not disposed to dispute it; but in order to settle the question so that it will be a guide until the Senate wants to do something else, I appeal from the decision of the Chair. Not intending to differ decidedly from the Chair, although that is my opinion, I wish to take the judgment of the Senate so as to make it a precedent to hold until the Senate wishes to do something else.

Mr. WINDOM. Let the rule be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the rule in respect to laying amendments upon the table.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

29. No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill; nor shall any amendment not germane or relevant to the subject-matter contained in the bill be received; nor shall any amendment to any item or clause of such bill be received which does not directly relate thereto; and all questions of relevancy of amendments under this rule, when raised, shall be submitted to the Senate and be decided without debate; and any amendment to a general appropriation bill may be laid on the table without prejudice to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] was adopted by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole; the bill was reported to the Senate and all the amendments were concurred in except that of the Senator from Kansas and perhaps others upon which separate votes were reserved. The bill is now in the Senate and the Senate is considering the amendment of the Senator from Kansas. The Senator from California moves to lay the amendment upon the table. The Chair, regarding it as an amendment pending in the Senate to the bill, holds that the motion to lay it upon the table is in order; and the question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate? Senators agreeing in that view will say "ay," those of a contrary opinion "no." [putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it. The ayes have it; and the decision of the Chair is sustained. The question is, Will the Senate lay the amendment of the Senator from Kansas upon the table?

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CALL. I understand that the question before the Senate is not properly the subject of debate. I intended to address the Senate upon the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair holds that the question is not debatable. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California, [Mr. BOOTH,] to lay the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] upon the table.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MORGAN, (when Mr. PUGH's name was called.) I understand that my colleague [Mr. PUGH] is detained by indisposition at his home.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 27, nays 18; as follows:

So the amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the bill by inserting after the word "dollars," in line 12 of the first section, these words:

Of which sum not exceeding $200,000 may be expended in the discretion of the President for the expediting of the examination and disposition of pension claims in the Department of the Interior and the Department of War.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. The amendment simply provides that the President of the United States, the Chief Executive of the nation, may make such use, up to the amount of this sum, of the money here appropriated as in his discretion will be best adapted to expediting the disposition of these claims. I think it better in some respects than the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, because it does not confine it to mere clerks. He may establish a little special board in the Interior Department, if he likes, with this money, if you choose to give it to him, to gather up these cases that are hanging by the eyelids, and have them disposed of by special examinations to get the thing forward; or if he thinks it better to appoint the ordinary routine clerks to that extent, he may do so. Certainly there ought to be the strongest motive on the part of everybody to provide the means, and by that I do not mean merely money, but the effective means of examination and disposition of these cases.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I shall support this amendment in the hope that the President of the United States will adopt some such system as was contemplated by the amendment of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. WITHERS] to this bill; that is, some system which will bring the pensioners themselves in contact with the examiners. I hope the President will find it to the interest of the public service to order the Pension Bureau to adopt some such system as the amendment of the Senator from Virginia contemplated, and I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Vermont in that hope.

Mr. BECK. I do not propose to make any point of order. I understand that the only point of order in the Senate is what the majority want, and therefore there is no use in raising a point of order on the amendment; but I desire to say to the Senate, after the suggestions of members of the Committee on Appropriations on both sides of the Chamber have been made, that we are entirely willing to ascertain and lay before the Senate in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill what each of the Departments or bureaus concerned thinks is best to be done, so as to expedite and guard the proper payment of pensions and the prompt payment of them as well. Such an effort on this bill, which is simply to pay pensions for the year ending June 30, 1882, is not advisable. We have committees of the House and committees of the Senate, and the object is to ascertain the needs of each one of these Departments. We can consult with the Commissioner of Pensions, with the Surgeon-General, with the Adjutant-General, with the Second Auditor, and we can then lay the facts before the Senate, and I have no doubt the committee of the House will do the same thing; and then Congress can act intelligently.

The proposition is now to deprive the committees of both Houses, to deprive both Houses themselves, of the opportunity of determining what in their judgment the needs of the different bureaus and Departments require, and in a bill simply to provide for the payment of pensions to transfer the power to the President of the United States to determine for us, as though we were incompetent to decide for ourselves what is the proper force required to do this work. We might just as well tell the President of the United States to furnish the Treasury Department with all the clerks it needs, the War Department with all the clerks it may need, the Navy Department, the Interior Department, and all the bureaus thereof, with everything that is required in his judgment, and put a fund in his discretion to do what he likes. If that is to be the system hereafter, then this amendment, perhaps, would be the proper thing to do; but if we propose to look into it ourselves and to understand it thoroughly, it is proper to get these things under the control of Congress and the committees of Congress, instead of making all these provisions simply a matter of Executive discretion. That is what all this means, and no more.

I only desire to say one word further. The pensioners who are upon the rolls, who have been there for years, are not disturbed by this delay. They are receiving their pensions promptly, and we have promptly furnished $19,000,000 to pay deficiencies for the current fiscal year, and there was no word of objection from either side; but an anomalous condition of things has sprung up, stimulated, as I believe, by the arrears-of-pensions act. In 1872 only 8,857 applications were filed for invalid pensions and 6,755 applications by the widows of pensioners. In 1880, eight years thereafter, as soon as the arrears-of-pensions law was passed, 110,000 claims of invalids were filed and 25,000 widows filed their claims. After waiting fifteen years, and not asserting their claims during all the time when it was presumed they would have asserted them, if many of them had been just or the parties had been needy, they waited until they saw that from a thousand to twelve or fifteen hundred dollars in each case could be secured, and they come in fifteen years after the war has closed, having waited all that time.

All we ask is to give us time to make a full and fair investigation as to these claims thus filed after these people have waited thus long. When a man waits fifteen years for an honest claim and fails to assert it, it excites some suspicion from that very fact alone; and when the claims swell from 8,000 to 110,000, as in the case of invalids, and from 6,000 to 25,000, as in the case of the widows, and when we see an inciting cause why this thing should spring up from these small to these large proportions under the arrears of pensions, and the ex parte system that can be carried out, and the claims obtained without any knowledge whether they are just or unjust, and the Commissioner dare not refuse them, surely there can be no great fault found if we ask these people, who have voluntarily waited so long, who constitute nine-tenths of the cases now delayed—after they have waited fifteen years after the war closed before they even presented their claims—to give us a chance to see that the claims thus postponed and thus stimulated by the hope of large gain shall be carefully looked at before we give the pensions. No honest pension claimant will object to that. He has waited himself for fifteen years before presenting his claim. We ask now to have the pension claims fairly looked at, and we ask time to consult with the Adjutant-General, with the Surgeon-General, with the Commissioner of Pensions, with the different officials who are charged with this responsible duty, and then we can lay the facts that they furnish us before the Senate, and we pledge ourselves to give every dollar that is necessary to secure the claim of every honest pensioner when we have the facts all laid before us.

After the Senator from Kansas has consented to that, after the Senate seem to have assented to it, the Senator from Vermont says "give the President the power," without giving us this opportunity and without waiting; and the only waiting that is to be done is until the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill comes in, which as the RECORD shows almost passed the House yesterday, perhaps will pass it to-day, and which perhaps will be before us to-morrow night and can be reported back to the Senate at an early day next week with every fact ascertained.

It is proposed to do that instead of putting on a provision which, if the Senate does assent to—I have no right to speak for the other House—I have no idea the House of Representatives will consider for a moment. The result will be to tie up this very meritorious bill and the meritorious features in it and delay the $19,000,000 of deficiencies, which were said to be absolutely necessary, much longer than they would be delayed if we were allowed to consider and pass upon it and give what all the Departments say is just in the legislative appropriation bill. I do hope that we shall be allowed to have that investigation, and that we shall not transfer to the President the power of the committees of the two Houses and the power of the two Houses themselves, and authorize him to do something that we know nothing about.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am very sorry that the Senator from Kentucky has thought it necessary to appeal to the fears of the Senate as to what another independent branch of the Government of this country may or may not do. We have been taught by the principles of parliamentary law, founded upon good sense and founded upon the independence of the two Houses, that it was altogether improper to undertake to sway legislation one way or the other by alluding to what another branch might or might not do. I propose for one to do what I think it right to do, without giving myself any concern as to what another independent branch of Congress may think it its duty to do; and my vote for this amendment or against it would not be affected in the slightest degree by what might be the independent opinion one way or the other, about which we can know nothing, of a co-ordinate branch of the Government. If my honorable friend from Kentucky thinks that is a good influence to govern the votes of Senators, of course it is his duty to follow his convictions. As I think it is not I do not propose to be frightened by the suggestion that it may be that if we had a committee of conference, if the other House should disagree, the Senate conferees might be disposed to recede from this amendment.

The Senator says that here is coming the legislative appropriation bill. How do we know that it is coming? We know it ought to come in due course, but we know that there are only a couple of weeks and a little over of legislative days. We know that there are an infinite number of subjects for consideration in this Congress—I will not say anything about Houses—and I certainly do not know that the legislative appropriation bill will become a law at this session. I do not know but that if it were here the Committee on Appropriations might choose to do as they have done with this present affair, raise a point of order upon amendments that should be put upon it; and I do not know but that the Senate might decide, and decide rightly, that the point of order was well taken. The Senate has decided that on this bill these points of order are not well taken, so that we have got to the merits. Where we may stand at some indefinite future period on some other bill on other points of order, or the same ones repeated, and the opinion of the Senate reversed, I do not know.

What I wish to do for one, as one of the people who are supposed to feel some sense of gratitude and obligation to those who are worthy, is to furnish the Executive Department of the Government the means of expediting the disposition of their claims one way or the other. Those who do not feel that these claims are worthy, who think that they are suspicious or that the service was not very meritorious, of course must be governed by their own convictions. Inasmuch as mine do not run in that direction, I propose, the Senate having held that this business on this bill is in order, to provide on this bill, if I can, for doing something toward calling upon the executive branch of the Government to take some means to endeavor to get on with the disposition of these cases.

But the Senator says that this is surrendering the powers of the committees of Congress, that we are giving up to the Executive to appoint all the clerks and regulate the management of the administration of the Government in his way. Mr. President, that is an unfounded fear. The whole history of legislation is full of instances where, on special occasions and in respect to special aspects, sums of money have been placed at the disposal of the Executive, responsible as he is to public opinion, responsible as he is to the coercive and punitory power of the two Houses of Congress exercised under the Constitution for any maladministration, in order to get on with the disposition of public affairs, leaving to him as I think in this case it can be best left, whether we do it this week, or the next, or the week after in this body, the selection of agencies and the arrangement of detail in respect of applying the force of the Government in some way to the examination and disposition of these claims. This is what my amendment proposes to do. I am not so much afraid of executive power (I certainly have as little disposition to enlarge it as the Senator from Kentucky) as to be afraid to authorize the President of the United States to employ the public money to the extent of $200,000 in such way as he thinks best to expedite the examination and disposition of these claims.

That is the way it appears to me, and therefore I hope that now and here, inasmuch as we all know without any special reports of the Committee on Pensions or the Committee on Appropriations that there is a blockade in that affair, we shall provide the means for having the blockade removed as far as this little sum will do it.

It is said that this is a matter for helping out the arrears-of-pension people. If it were, it would not be very bad. Congress has voted that the arrears-of-pension people are entitled, and therefore we must carry it out. But it is not chiefly for those who have applied recently. I believe I stated before, and I repeat, that of the letters I get from a great many of the thirty-odd thousand soldiers whom Vermont furnished to the preservation of the Union, the largest share is from people whose claims for pensions were filed long before the arrears-of-pension bill was under discussion; some of them I remember are stated to have been pending, and I have no doubt truly stated, for eight and ten and I believe in one case eleven years, pigeonholed on some little difficulty. Inquire at the Pension Office, and they say "We have not got a report from the War Department," and so on. Now I wish to provide the President with the means in some way, the best means for which he is responsible in this little matter of detail, of providing for expediting these long-standing cases. I know that the Senator from Kentucky—I believe, and certainly I think I am entitled to say that I know—is just as willing as I am to do justice to all these people. He thinks we ought to wait and consider further. It appears to me that we ought to act now.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, I cannot support this amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, and I do not propose by my silence to be placed in the position in voting against it of deciding that this service is not meritorious. I vote against it because I do not believe it is the practicable way of securing the object desired, which I stated more fully a few moments ago when on my feet. I believe that to place this amendment in this bill in this form is to lose it. I want to place it on the proper bill and in the proper form, so as to obtain the thing that we seek to do. I would rather do something for the soldier than to talk for him, Mr. President, and it is because I want to do something for him that I want to place it in the proper form that it will be passed by both Houses.

Now, as to delay, keeping those waiting who are entitled to pensions, we have in this bill $17,000,000 and over of deficiencies where the claims have been passed upon and are now simply waiting the money to be appropriated in order that they may be paid. There is no more examination necessary, nothing to be done but that we shall place the money at the command of the Commissioner of Pensions to pay over to the pensioners whose claims have been found. Now, the question is whether we shall put a controverted question here which shall delay this bill two or three weeks, possibly until near the close of the session, and thereby delay the people who are entitled to the $17,000,000, whose claims have been proved and settled. I am not in favor of that. I believe that by placing this on the bill which is to come within the next week we shall secure it; we shall secure the immediate passage of this bill and everybody will get his claims quicker, more expeditiously than if we undertake to pass a lump sum, which I am opposed to under all circumstances, and which, if it will not offend my honorable friend from Vermont, I will say that I have every reason to believe the other House is opposed to, and which will result in the defeat of this measure.

I know that it is not proper to undertake to alarm anybody by what the other House will do, and I do not use it for that purpose, but I refer to it as a reason for the course I take here, because I want to have the thing done rather than to talk about it, and, therefore, I hope that it may be done in the way that will secure it best.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to put a question to my honorable friend from Minnesota or to some other member of the committee, not in the least as a taunt or a suggestion of reproach, but to elicit a contribution to the history of this matter. I understand that the Senator from Kentucky maintains that it would be a little disrespectful to this committee not to wait ten days or a fortnight to get their views as to the remedy for this evil, which they think they can more properly state when the legislative bill shall be in order. Now, how does it happen that we did not get the views of that able and excellent committee last year when the legislative bill was in order? The evil has been crying in our ears for more than twelve months, and when the bill passed last year the Committee on Appropriations, who claim now that this is a matter within their jurisdiction, made no movement for an increase of this clerical force.

The point of my inquiry—and it is put because I have no doubt there is some good answer to it—is, how it happened that if this committee deem this is a matter within their jurisdiction and that they will attend to it, they did not attend to it then.

Mr. WINDOM. I hope that the Senator from Massachusetts will not have his vote influenced in the slightest degree by any sensitiveness on the part of the committee. The position I take upon this subject has nothing of that kind in it. The Senator asks the question why it was not done last year. If my recollection serves me, we did add one hundred and fifty, or about that number, of clerks to this department for that purpose last year; the Senate did it on the recommendation of the committee. It was then supposed that was all the number that could be used. I am satisfied now that a larger number can be used, and I am satisfied that if the appropriations are made in the proper form they will be used, and I want to secure them in the proper form so that they will be effective.

Mr. WITHERS. According to my recollection we gave to those departments which are engaged in the investigation of pension cases every clerk they asked for, every one that they said was necessary, amounting to a large increase of clerical force, in the aggregate over one hundred.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I voted against the amendment of the Senator from Kansas because of its indefinite character. Now the Senator from Vermont proposes another amendment placing the whole discretion of the use of this money in the hands of the President, and he starts out with an appropriation of $200,000. I should be glad to know from some Senator who has charge of this matter now whether or not $200,000 is a sufficient sum to execute the purposes aimed at in this proposition. I have no objection myself to giving this or any other sum to the President of the United States to be used for this purpose; but I do not see the necessity of appropriating a lump sum, without knowing whether it is a sufficient sum or whether the whole sum will be needed, out of the appropriations made for the purpose of paying pensioners who are already upon the pension-roll, because this $48,000,000 is absolutely essential to pay the pensioners now upon the roll; and yet a portion of this sum is to be diverted to another purpose.

I think I can answer the question of the Senator from Massachusetts who asks why it is that the Committee on Appropriations did not last year make some provision by which these cases could be expedited. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the fact that on the 25th day of March, 1880, now nearly one year ago, the proper committee of this body having in charge the subject of pensions placed upon this Calendar a bill looking to a rearrangement and readjustment of the methods by which pension cases should be decided.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why did they not move to take it up?

Mr. ALLISON. I have yet to see or hear of a Senator pressing that bill before the Senate for consideration. The bill has been upon our Calendar for more than a year. I am not aware that either the Senator from Massachusetts or the Senator from Vermont has pressed the bill to a consideration. It was endeavored here the other day to put it upon this pension appropriation bill, and points of order were raised, I believe, by a member of the Committee on Appropriations. I voted that not that, but some other provision was in order on this bill. I am as willing and as anxious as any Senator on this floor is that the pension cases now blockaded in the Pension Office shall be adjusted finally, so that the applicants if entitled to pensions shall obtain them. But I submit to Senators that, without any recommendation from the Secretary of the Interior, without any knowledge derived from the Secretary of War as to the method by which these claims for pensions can be adjusted, it is not wise for us to place a lump sum in the hands of the President or anybody else for that purpose.

The legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill is the proper bill upon which to consider the subject of increased clerical force; and for one I am ready and willing to consider it upon that bill. I understood that there was a proposition made here—I did not happen to be in the Senate at the time—that any amendment looking to the adjustment of this question should be put on the legislative bill without objection as to points of order.

Mr. TELLER. I suppose the Senator from Iowa knows that any person can make a point of order. It is impossible to make such an agreement effective.

Mr. ALLISON. By unanimous consent it can be done.

Mr. TELLER. As suggested, you will not know any more about it then than now, and if it is ever put on in the Senate it might as well be put on now as next week.

Mr. ALLISON. Possibly we may not know anything about it then; but we are in the habit in the Senate of requiring careful estimates from the Departments with reference to the employés in their several Departments, and so careful are we here in the Senate that points of order are raised if anybody undertakes to increase the compensation of a clerk in a Department from $1,200 to $1,400 on the ground that that is a change of the law. Now we propose on a bill that does not relate to the interior administration of the Pension Office to place $200,000 in the hands of the President to be used as he may see fit to use it in adjusting claims. As was suggested by the Senator from Rhode Island who now proclaims his purpose to vote for this amendment, the President may, if he chooses, adopt the machinery of Senate bill No. 496, and carry out its provisions under this amendment. There is no limitation on his power. He may do exactly what is proposed in Senate bill No. 496. I do not know but that that would be the wisest and best method of expending this money; but it seems to me that we ought to consider the question more carefully with reference to the amount required and with reference to the number of persons to be employed and the compensation to be paid them.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Allow me to say that I announced my willingness to vote for this amendment if it was declared in order; but if a point of order is raised against the amendment I shall vote, as I did against the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, that the amendment is not in order on this bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I am as willing as is the Senator from Vermont or the Senator from Massachusetts to do anything and everything that will expedite these cases; and I believe, as the Senator from Minnesota has already stated, that the most expeditious and safest method is to put the amendments, whatever they are, on the appropriate bill for that purpose.

It is said that we do not know that the legislative bill will be passed during this session. We do know that if it is not passed the Senate will be in session one week after the 4th day of March; and there cannot be any delay on that account. The legislative bill is as certain to pass as this pension bill is certain to pass before the 4th of March, and it is the appropriate bill upon which this question should be considered; and therefore it is that I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, and I shall do what I can before this session closes to have a careful and considerate amendment adopted which will accomplish exactly what this amendment proposes to accomplish by placing all the power in the hands of the President.

Mr. WHYTE. I believe the Senate is ready for a vote on this question, and I therefore move to lay the amendment of the Senator from Vermont on the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair.) The Senator from Maryland moves to lay the amendment of the Senator from Vermont on the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I move to postpone this bill indefinitely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont moves to postpone the bill indefinitely.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And on that I propose to say a few words.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont has the floor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am inclined to think that the bill ought not to be postponed indefinitely and I will give some reasons why my motion ought not to be agreed to. One is that I think the bill ought to provide for expediting the examination of pension claims, and to that I shall devote my attention chiefly.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] says that if the consideration of this question can be postponed until we get another bill next week, assuming that we shall get it then, we can, without any points of order or other troubles, it being still an appropriation bill——

Mr. WHYTE. Will the Senator allow me to rise to a question of order?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly, my friend has a right to rise to a question of order.

Mr. WHYTE. I should like to inquire of the Chair if my motion does not take precedence of the motion of the Senator from Vermont, it being a motion to lay on the table?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Unhappily it does not. Motions to postpone indefinitely precede motions to lay on the table.

Mr. WHYTE. Not according to the rules of the Senate as I read them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We shall see.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read Rule 43.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

When a question is pending no motion shall be received but—
To adjourn,
To adjourn to a day certain, or that when the Senate adjourn, it shall be to a day certain,
To take a recess,
To proceed to the consideration of executive business,
To lay on the table,
To postpone indefinitely,
To postpone to a day certain,
To commit,
To amend;
which several motions shall have precedence in the order in which they stand arranged.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, Mr. President, that is perfectly true; but the Senator did not move to lay this bill on the table. If he had, then his point of order would have been good; but I supposed he did not wish to lay the bill on the table. Therefore the pending question is on the indefinite postponement of this bill.

Mr. WHYTE. I ask for a decision by the Chair of the question of order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So do I.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will hear the Senator from Maryland make his point of order. Will he please state it specifically?

Mr. WHYTE. The point of order is that I moved to lay upon the table the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, and under the rules of the Senate that motion precedes a motion for an indefinite postponement of the bill. The postponement carries with it the amendment also. I have moved to lay the amendment on the table, which would precede a vote to postpone indefinitely the whole bill, amendments and all.

Mr. HOAR. How could the motion of the Senator from Vermont come in order? The duty of the Chair is to put the question on the motion to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. WHYTE. Without debate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is a question of precedence of motions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will decide that the motion of the Senator from Vermont is not in order, but of this the Chair has some doubt, and if the Senator desires, will submit it to the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no, Mr. President, the motion being ruled out of order, the motion to postpone the bill indefinitely is not in order. That standing as the judgment of the Senate, I submit to it with such pleasure as I can. Now I withdraw my amendment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont withdraws his amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And I move to postpone the bill indefinitely.

Mr. WHYTE. Can the Senator withdraw his amendment without the consent of the Senate?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think I can. The yeas and nays have not been ordered.

Mr. WHYTE. But the motion to lay it on the table has been made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The yeas and nays have not been ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays not having been ordered, the Senator from Vermont withdraws his amendment, and moves now, what?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to postpone the bill indefinitely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont moves to postpone the bill indefinitely.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, is it in order to submit a few observations on that motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will decide that it is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I will go on.

Mr. WITHERS. Mr. President, I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly, for a moment.

Mr. WITHERS. As I understand it now, the Senator from Vermont moves to withdraw an amendment which has been laid upon the table by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not understand it that way, Mr. President.

Mr. WITHERS. I thought I must be mistaken, and therefore I wished to know if that was the fact. According to my recollection an amendment was moved by the Senator from Vermont. The Senator from Maryland moved to lay that amendment on the table, the Chair decided that that motion was in order, and the question then came up on the motion to lay the amendment on the table, nothing else being in order, until that was disposed of. How is it possible for the Senator from Vermont, in that condition of things, to withdraw his amendment?

Mr. WHYTE. I do not understand that, either.

Mr. WITHERS. Pending the decision of the motion made by the Senator from Maryland, how could the amendment be withdrawn?

Mr. WALLACE. The effect of it evidently is to withdraw the motion to lay on the table of the Senator from Maryland, which the Senator from Vermont cannot do.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Have I a right to go on, Mr. President?

Mr. WHYTE. Not until this question of order is disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia, the Chair understands by his remarks, raises a question of order as to whether the Senator from Vermont can withdraw the amendment.

Mr. WITHERS. Whether he can withdraw his amendment after a motion to lay it on the table has been made by another Senator and pending the vote on that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would thank the Senator from Virginia to submit some rule which would prevent the Senator from Vermont from withdrawing his amendment.

Mr. FERRY. Is it not very clear, Mr. President, that a motion, until amended, or the yeas and nays have been ordered upon it, can be withdrawn by the mover at any time?

Mr. INGALLS. Rule 44 settles the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has decided that the Senator from Vermont had a right to withdraw his amendment, and he did withdraw it, and now the question is raised whether he had that right to withdraw it or not, and the Chair has asked for some rule which would not authorize the decision made by the Chair.

Mr. TELLER. May Rule 44 be read?

Mr. WITHERS. I have not the rules before me; but ordinary parliamentary law dictates that when a motion is before the House only certain things can be done. The motion before the House now is to lay the amendment on the table, and it seems to me that until a vote is had on that motion the Senator moving the amendment cannot obtain control of it; it is in the possession of the House and can only be disposed of by a vote upon that amendment or upon the motion to lay on the table unless that motion be withdrawn.

Mr. TELLER. Let us have Rule 44 read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has decided the question, and if any Senator desires to appeal from the decision of the Chair the Chair will gladly submit it to the decision of the Senate.

Mr. WITHERS. I do not desire particularly to appeal from the decision of the Chair. I only wanted to know what was to be the rule of action in this body. This is contrary to what prevails ordinarily in any parliamentary bodies of which I have had any knowledge.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont has the floor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, Mr. President, if everybody is satisfied I will proceed. Anybody in this particular branch of the Government who undertakes to prevent a Senator from saying what he wishes to say will require a longer time to do it than it took to elect a President of the United States.

Mr. WITHERS. I will say that that was not my purpose at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I know that.

Mr. WITHERS. I was perfectly aware that the Senator had it in his power by various devices to say what he desired to say on the merits of the proposition. It was not for any such purpose that I made the point.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What I wish to say is not to devise, but to advise, in respect to which I mark a difference. Now I will proceed, if I am perfectly in order, to submit an observation in reply to my friend from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

We all profess to be desirous of aiding in the disposition of the great accumulation of pension claims; we all profess that we wish to do it at the earliest possible moment; but a great many of us profess that our present state of mind is such that we would rather do it at some other time and on some other bill than now, and we are told that if we wait a week or two, we shall have further information, that we are not accustomed to vote money to be expended to carry on the Government without the estimate of the head of a Department; and here it is said there is no estimate for the proposition that I had the honor to submit. That is true. Are you likely to get an estimate when the Department of the Interior and the Pension Office have all their ideas wedded to the sixty-surgeon bill as it is called, and do not wish until that has been tried to provide additional means of going on under the present organization? If you wait until then, a good many gray hairs and a good many sore hearts will go down to the grave before you get any legislation at all. If we have the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill before us next week, there will be no estimate for clerk, or examiner, or copyist, or whatever, unless between this time and that some spur is applied to some head of a Department to make one. The ordinary course of things will bring no estimate; it will bring no new knowledge. The knowledge we have is sufficient already; and that is that on account of some trouble or other either of administration or inadequacy of force or something, this business of the examination of pension claims is greatly, shamefully delayed; and by that I do not mean to intimate that every pension claim is a right one; far from it. Some are wrong; but if some are wrong it furnishes to my mind no reason for delaying or checking those that are right. You might just as well refuse to provide for administering justice in a court, because always heretofore (and always hereafter it will be so) a certain proportion of the causes that are brought to judicial adjudication are false and fraudulent claims and causes, but the false must take their turn with the true to be tried and dismissed while the true are carried into their just operations. That is just what it is in this pension business.

Now, then, the simple thing to do, as it appears to me, is, having the pension bill before us, and the Senate having determined on a yea-and-nay vote that an appropriation bill is a suitable place to consider this question, to proceed to provide the means for trying to get on. The Senator from Iowa asks, how do we know that $200,000 is enough? I do not know. I know that it will go so far, if honestly applied and properly devoted to the selection of such agents and clerks and objects as will touch the spots of delay in these old cases and help get them forward. The Senator asks how do we know that it is not too much? Suppose it to be too much, this only authorizes the President by way of limitation; he is not required, to expend the whole sum. But the Senator says that this is an appropriation bill, and that all this $48,400,000 is needed to pay pensions already due. That is a mistake. Seventeen million dollars is necessary to pay pensions, as we are told, already due. The other $31,000,000 is to provide for accruing pensions that have been and may be allowed in the course of the current year from the 1st of July, 1881, to the 30th of June, 1882. If it turns out at the next December session that this appropriation is inadequate, as it turned out that the last year's appropriation was inadequate, we can supply the deficiency; but I am willing for one to take my risk of doing injustice to the payments of pensions under this bill in doing the best thing I can for these pensioners and provide for the examination and promotion of a disposition of their claims. That is the point, Mr. President, and I think it right in reply to my friend from Iowa to say so.

I did not wish to take up the time of the Senate, but I did not think it quite just that the Senator from Maryland, as I had moved this amendment, should cut me off from the right of replying to the observations of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. WHYTE. I did not mean to do that. I did not know the Senator wished to speak.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I know the Senator from Maryland had no personal hostility either to me or to my amendment in making that motion. Now, having said this, Mr. President, I withdraw my motion to postpone this bill indefinitely, and I renew the amendment that I had the honor to submit a little while ago.

Mr. WHYTE. Then I renew the motion to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the Senator from Maryland to withdraw his motion for a single second.

Mr. WHYTE. If the Senator will renew it.

Mr. WINDOM. I will renew it. I think the amendment illustrates very well the impropriety of ill-considered and hasty legislation. The Senator from Vermont proposes to expedite the consideration of these pension claims, and the bill provides that this money, $48,000,000, shall be for the payment of pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and not a dollar of it is available until after the 30th of June next. The Senator's amendment, which is to expedite these pension claims so much, will not be available until after the 30th of June next, so that nobody will be hastened very much. I now renew the motion of the Senator from Maryland to lay the amendment on the table, as I agreed to do.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope my friend will withdraw that motion.

Mr. WHYTE. I withdraw it.

Mr. WINDOM. I want to say to the Senator from Vermont that I propose to keep my agreement; and now, if he will renew it, I withdraw the motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will say as to that, that if the Senate shall be of the opinion that it is right to intrust the President with $200,000 to endeavor to secure the best agencies for getting on with this business, and this amendment be agreed to, I had already prepared an additional amendment, providing that this sum should be available immediately.

Mr. WHYTE. Now I renew the motion to lay the amendment on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland moves to lay the amendment of the Senator from Vermont on the table. Upon that question the Senator from Vermont calls for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BLAIR. I only wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. I suppose a majority of the Senate are in favor of the bill reported by the Committee on Pensions with such modifications as might readily be made to it by amendments. My inquiry is this: If the amendment of the Senator from Vermont should not be laid on the table, would it be in order to move as an amendment to his amendment the substance of that bill with such modifications as might be inserted therein to meet the general wish of the Senate in that direction, so that this amendment being in order an amendment thereto could be attached? In this way we could get substantially what is desired by the Interior Department, and upon this same bill, if that can be done, and I see no reason why it may not be done; and then if the amount which the Senator from Vermont proposes, some $200,000, could be increased to half a million, the President in his discretion might be authorized to carry out the bill which a majority of the Senate desire. As no part of the money in this bill is available until next July, it seems there cannot be any very great haste about the passage of this bill, and the discussion which it is proposed to postpone until the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill comes to the Senate may just as well take place here and the whole matter be disposed of.

Mr. WINDOM. There is a deficiency of about seventeen million dollars in this bill.

Mr. BLAIR. That is only a small proportion of the bill. I should like to know the opinion of the Chair upon the question as a matter of parliamentary procedure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will decide that an amendment which was not itself in order would not be in order to an amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly not; but this amendment is in order; no exception has been taken to it on that ground; no one has raised any point of order. There is a motion to lay this amendment on the table. If that motion should be denied the amendment would remain before the Senate, and it could be so changed in the manner I have suggested as that the whole subject-matter which the Senate desires to incorporate into the administration of the pension law could be attached to this bill, and the difficulty which we have encountered thus far would be avoided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator to inquire whether the amendment which had been previously ruled out of order would be in order to this amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. No, Mr. President; this amendment is in order as I understand, the amendment of the Senator from Vermont. No one has raised any point of order against it, and the discussion of it has proceeded. I suppose it is to be taken for granted that it is in order; and if so and it should not be laid on the table, why may not the majority of the Senate who desire to enact the sixty-surgeons bill as it is called, or Senate bill No. 496, with such modifications as can be readily incorporated in it to suit the majority, add that as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, and this matter be reached immediately? If the amendment of the Senator from Vermont is laid on the table, of course that is the end of it.

It does seem to me that if I am correct in the view of parliamentary law involved here, this motion to lay the amendment on the table may well be rejected by a majority of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 35, nays 23; as follows:

So the amendment was ordered to lie on the table.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BOOTH. I move to amend the title by adding "and for other purposes."

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WALLACE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of the bill which he has indicated.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania oblige me by withholding the motion for a moment?

Mr. WALLACE. When the bill has been taken up I will yield.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to call attention to something in connection with the bill just passed.

Mr. WALLACE. Whenever the bill has been reported I will yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves to take up a bill, the title of which will be read, so that the Senate will know what the motion is.

The Chief Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. No. 6972) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

Mr. WALLACE. I now yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on proceeding to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HOAR. I understood that before the pension amendment was voted down some of the members of the Appropriations Committee gave assurance informally to the Senate that they would ask unanimous consent that amendments covering this question might be in order on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. I desire to ask the Senator from Kentucky whether it would not be well to ask that consent now?

Mr. BECK. I asked at the time I made the suggestion that it be done. I hope it will be done now. I desire the fullest, freest, fairest consideration of the necessities of the Pension Office, and if the Senate will agree now to what I suggested this morning I shall be very much gratified. Whether they do or not, when the question does come up I shall vote to give it the fullest and fairest consideration.

Mr. WINDOM. I believe the Senator was understood as asking consent.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that an amendment may be in order in reference to this question of pensions on the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. BECK. I hope that will be done.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent of the Senate that when the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill is being considered by the Senate an amendment in regard to the pension matter shall be in order.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. For the increase of employés.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us know exactly what it is.

Mr. TELLER. I want to make an inquiry of the Senator from Iowa, who seems to have this in charge.

Mr. ALLISON. No, I have not the bill in charge; I have this particular thing in charge of asking unanimous consent.

Mr. TELLER. I want to inquire whether any one will be at liberty to move any amendment in reference to this question that has been before the Senate, without reference to what the Department may say. I was told awhile ago that nothing would be in order unless the Department backed it up.

Mr. WITHERS. Except Senate bill No. 496; that is out of order.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that all amendments looking to the expediting of the consideration of pension claims may be in order on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, which is the proper bill.

Mr. WINDOM. I understood that if an additional appropriation for expediting pension claims is to be put on that bill, it is to be reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The whole subject is to be open on that bill?

Mr. ALLISON. Whatever there is.

Mr. INGALLS. From whatever quarter it may emanate.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not understand that that was the agreement.

Mr. TELLER. I do not think we should be required to consent that the bill reported by the Committee on Pensions, this new system of getting at the pensions, ought to be put on. I do not propose to consent to that, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask unanimous consent that all amendments increasing the clerical force in the Departments shall be in order on that bill.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I do not consent to that, Mr. President. The understanding with me was that all fair amendments touching the expediting of the granting of pensions were to be considered in order, and I am not going into any jug-handled arrangement of that kind, anybody could get up here in a captious way——

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I have not talked much to-day, and I hope the Senator will allow me to express my views.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question of order must be entertained by the Chair. The Senator from Florida will state his question of order.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. What is the question before the Senate, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WALLACE.] Senators then asked consent of the Senate for certain things, and the Chair does not hold that he has the power to confine them to that question. The Senator from Rhode Island has the floor.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Now, Mr. President, I say that it was my understanding, and I think it was the understanding of nine Senators out of ten who hear me, that all fair amendments which looked to the expediting of the consideration of pension claims were to be considered in order and voted upon on their merits. I am not going into any arrangement whatever that will allow an amendment to be ruled out of order simply because six or eight or ten Senators in this body have objected to it heretofore, and have by parliamentary means clogged the passage of a bill which I think three-fourths of the Senate want to pass. I do not think it is fair and right, and I will never consent to it.

Mr. TELLER. It was distinctly understood at the time when it was broached here by the Committee on Appropriations that it only referred to the increase of clerical force. Everybody understood that, the Senator from Rhode Island did——

Mr. BURNSIDE. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. TELLER. If he did not, then he did not gather his understanding from anything said by any member of that committee; and it was because I saw that there was a disposition after the Senate had disposed of that amendment to adopt an entirely different policy and pursue a different course, which I thought was unfair, that I made the objection, and I propose to stand by the objection. I do not propose that the legislative bill shall be encumbered with that measure. If three-fourths of the Senate want that bill let them bring it up. It has been here since last March. It was asked why we had not brought it up. It would be a piece of impudence, I suppose, if anybody had sought to bring it up except members of the committee. They have seen fit to let it rest here. Now, if they want it, let them bring it up in the regular way. I am opposed to putting on any appropriation bill that bill, whether it is a good one or a bad one, and I propose to stand by the law.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I propose to stand by my objection. I have as much right on this floor as any other Senator, and I do not propose that the rights of a majority of the Senate shall be cut off by any agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that all amendments to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill increasing the clerical force on account of the Pension Office shall be in order.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island objects, and that settles that question.

Mr. BECK. I desire to speak to the question of taking up of the Post-Office bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky has the floor.

Mr. BECK. Preliminary to making the statement I rose to make, I wish to say that I believe I have heard the rules of the Senate often construed to mean that anything is in order by way of debate, no matter what it is, and I can discuss the Nicaraguan Canal, or the Eads jetties, or anything I like on this motion. It has been done so often that I presume I have that right.

I desire to say that when I asked the Senator from Kansas to withdraw his amendment, it was on the ground that if the Senate would allow us to consider the question of what was the necessary force required by the Pension Office, the necessary number of clerks to be added to the Surgeon-General's Office and the Adjutant-General's Office and the Second Auditor's Office, in order to examine applications for pensions, I hoped the Senate would give unanimous consent that we should lay the result before the Senate on the legislative bill without any point of order being made. I could not obtain that consent.

I say now that when the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill comes up before the Committee on Appropriations, if I can have my way, we shall send for the Commissioner of Pensions, the Surgeon-General, the Second Auditor, the Adjutant-General, and all men connected with pensions or who have charge of that business, and so far as they tell me that they need additional force to expedite the payment of honest claims, I shall not only vote for it, but I shall vote that it shall be in order to consider that increase of force, and I hope the Senate will give unanimous consent now that all these things may be done on that bill. I believe it is the interest of the pensioner; I believe it is the interest of good order; I believe we shall keep regularity of system if these things should be allowed. If, however, the Senate will not give that consent, when the bill comes up before the body, if no one else does I shall move that these questions shall all be considered, shall be fairly heard, and I shall vote that such amendments are in order. I agree to every word the Senator from Massachusetts said as to the pledge I desired to give.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield?

Mr. BECK. I am done.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I beg to ask the Senator from Kentucky a question. If the Commissioner of Pensions should recommend to him, or to his committee, or to the Senate, that he should have the right to employ a surgeon and a lawyer in each congressional district, and to employ clerks in each district, to be placed in immediate communication with the pensioners, as nearly so as possible, would the Senator consider that as a proper increase of force?

Mr. BECK. I consider that the Senate settled that question by ruling it out of order, and that nothing else can come up on the legislative appropriation bill than the employment of additional force.

Mr. BURNSIDE. That would be additional force.

Mr. BECK. It would be additional legislation, which, if the Pension Committee will bring up as an original proposition, I will consider and vote for or against according as the reason of the case may determine my course.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Would the Senator consider an amendment in order at this time which provided that the additional clerks and employés hired under the appropriation should be residents of the congressional districts where the pensioners belong and should be placed in communication with the pensioners as nearly as possible? Would the Senator consider that to be in order?

Mr. BECK. As at present advised I would not consider that that came within the scope of the conversation we had this morning.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to remark that if the Senator from Kentucky says that this so-called surgeons bill comes within the scope of the statement he made, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. ALLISON. He says he does not so consider it.

Mr. WITHERS. I claim the right to say a word in connection with the statement made by the Senator from Colorado a few minutes ago in reference to this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. WITHERS. In that statement the Senator said that no effort whatever had been made to secure action on this bill since last March. The Senator is clearly mistaken. Twice, at least, I have given notice to the Senate of my purpose to call it up, but have been unable to obtain the floor to do so at the time indicated and when I wished to do so. It was no fault of mine that it was not taken up. On the contrary, I have anxiously desired it everyday since the bill was reported to the present time. As to whether the bill is in order as an amendment. I understand from the Senator from Colorado that anything will be in order except that particular measure. We can increase the force in the Department in any way, in any branch of the service, and do anything connected with pensions except that particular measure of proposing to establish a court of a surgeon and a lawyer to examine and take evidence, and that is never in order.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me for a moment?

Mr. TELLER. I want to say a word upon this subject, and then I will yield entirely.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will not take half a minute.

Mr. TELLER. I will yield entirely in a moment. What I desired was that just what the Senator from Kentucky had stated to the Senate should be enforced. If he did state it broad enough so that it will include the surgeons bill, as the Senator from Rhode Island thinks he did, I would be willing to withdraw my objection. I understood him to say that he did not mean that and did not so state. Therefore I think I am justified in maintaining my objection.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to say to the Senate that I wish to have an executive session this evening for reasons that I cannot state here, and while I do not wish to antagonize the Senator from Pennsylvania in getting up the Post-Office appropriation bill, I shall be compelled to ask for an executive session if there is further debate in reference to his motion.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WALLACE. I ask that the pending question be put; which is that the Post-Office appropriation bill be made the order of business.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. What is the regular order now before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. EDMUNDS in the chair.) The question before the Senate is that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I wish to say that while I have no disposition whatever to obstruct the consideration of any regular appropriation bill, as a matter of ordinary justice I shall claim that the Senate ought to permit the regular order to be considered for reasons that I will state. When the pension appropriation bill was taken up the regular order of the Senate was a bill for the relief of two naval officers, Messrs. Sigsbee and Sands. The Senator from California [Mr. FARLEY] moved to take up that bill, which was done, and before an explanation of it could well be given, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. ROLLINS] made a speech in opposition to the measure, and in the course of that speech he asked the Naval Committee certain questions, which up to this time that committee, myself and the Senator from California representing it, have not had an opportunity to answer. That bill is the regular order and we consented that it might be laid aside temporarily, so that the pension appropriation bill could be considered, with the understanding that after the pension bill was disposed of that measure should resume its original place.

Mr. VOORHEES. Of what measure does the Senator speak?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The bill for the relief of Sigsbee and Sands; and up to this time, although the claim for relief made by these officers was fiercely attacked and has gone on the record as an imposition, no friend of that measure has been permitted to open his mouth in their defense.

Mr. VOORHEES. I should like to have a chance to say a word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that as the Chair understands, no entry in respect of the bill referred to by the Senator from Florida has been made on the Journal. Whatever there was about it was a matter of conversation among Senators. Therefore, the Chair thinks that the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania is in order, to proceed to the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I ask the Chair if there is nothing to show that the bill to which I refer is the regular order after the pension appropriation bill is disposed of?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Nothing, as the Chair understands from the Journal, was before the Senate as its unfinished business or as the special order; so that the Chair thinks the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania is in order, which is to proceed to the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill, and whatever else may occur depends upon the opinion of Senators as to what they are bound to observe.

Mr. WALLACE. I trust the Senate will permit me to get up the Post-Office appropriation bill. It would be a new precedent in the Senate to lay aside an appropriation bill, at this stage of the session, to take up private bills. I trust we shall take up the bill, and after it has been taken up let it be informally laid aside, if it is the desire of the Senate so to do, in order to proceed to any other business. I will consent to that course; but let it be taken up in order to be the unfinished business to be proceeded with in the morning.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I have been trying for about half an hour to say a word or two on the floor of the Senate. I know it is more difficult for the Presiding Officer to look sidewise than straight forward, and consequently those will be recognized——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has recognized the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. VOORHEES. It is not the fault of the present occupant of the chair. I have suffered that way ever since I have been in the Senate Chamber.

I simply desire to say, in all good nature, that I intend from this moment on, without cessation and without absences from my seat, without relaxing a particle of vigilance, to press upon the consideration of the Senate the bill providing additional accommodations for the Library. I know that it is my duty to do so, and I intend to do it. I gave notice the other day that as soon as the pension appropriation bill was disposed of I should ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of that bill, but there have been about fifty-three Senators recognized since the termination of the pension appropriation bill, while I was trying to make good the notice which I gave the other day.

It is not worth while to seek to evade the consideration of this question; in fact nobody would wish to do so; but unless I make myself very disagreeable in pressing it upon the attention of the Senate, it will not get through here perhaps at all, and certainly not in time to go to the House. We are in such a condition that I should feel derelict, I should feel like a culprit in the discharge of my duty, if I did not do something to relieve the Congressional Library of its miserable condition.

I told the Senator from Pennsylvania the other day (because I do not think a want of frankness is one of the faults of my character) that I should make this motion. I will not undertake to say that that is the reason why he has been determined that I should not have the floor: but we might as well have this matter settled at one time as another. I am not anxious to antagonize appropriation bills. I would not antagonize the pension appropriation bill; but I think I will encounter the weight of a Post-Office appropriation bill with the question of whether the disgraceful condition of our Library shall continue, with a prospect of its continuing for years if we do not act now.

I think we can adjust the business before the Senate so that all can get through. My friend from Texas on my right [Mr. COKE] is anxious to have the remnant of his Indian bill considered; and if, for instance, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] and other gifted orators here, who speak with so much ease and grace and fluency, would give a little security that they would not pioneer upon it, I would be willing to have it taken up; not but what I always listen with infinite pleasure to those discussions, but if we wait until all these measures are disposed of, I am afraid that the books of the Library will have a hard time.

I have but one word more to say, and that is in the shape of an appeal to the accomplished Senator from Pennsylvania, who takes as deep an interest in the Library as anybody else, and to the scholastic and learned Senator from Texas, that when the Post-Office appropriation bill is taken up it may be laid aside, so that the Library bill may have two or three hours. The Library question cannot be a very prolific one for two reasons: In the first place, it is very difficult for any man to make a long speech on a question of whether we ought to build a house on one lot or upon another. It does not branch out; it does not give scope to the imagination. The other reason is, that on a question of architecture, very few people know anything, and while some people can talk on subjects they do not understand, as a matter of course Senators do not belong to that class, so that I do not see where there is much scope for an elaborate discussion in regard to the Library.

I wish to say, if the Senate will pardon me for doing so, that at the close of the last session of Congress, within a few days before its close, a very important bill passed both branches and became a law, under which a joint select committee composed of three Senators and three Members were appointed, whose duty it was to select architectural experts. I say to the Senate that within thirty minutes after the last session of Congress adjourned in June last I had that committee together. We met and went to work. Before we left the city we appointed our expert architects, and they did their duty with industry, with fidelity, and with great skill, so that when we met here last December we had about us a wealth of design and of instruction from our expert architects that was delightful to encounter.

This joint select committee continued in session almost every day for the first month of the present session of Congress. We have perfected our labors so far as we are concerned. We have made our report; we have reported our bill; and now the crying need of the hour or of the moment is to take it up and consider it like sensible men, and dispose of it. As I have already observed, it cannot take long. The committee has reported in favor of a certain locality. If the locality does not command the approbation of a majority of the Senate, let the majority of the Senate locate it some place else. I stand here to plead for no one corner lot over another. I have concurred with the majority of the committee in regard to a certain locality, but my chief and prime object is to build a Library building which will accommodate the books and the valuable material now going to destruction where it is at present located, and it is not a matter of supreme consequence to me where the Library is located.

It is a matter, though, of supreme consequence and of honor on the part of Congress to build one that will accommodate the books we have and the constant flowing stream that is being emptied into our Library.

I have been betrayed into saying a great deal more than I possibly should have done if I had been allowed to speak earlier, but I now earnestly appeal to the Senator from Pennsylvania to let this great question be considered so that the bill can go to the House of Representatives and become a law before the session closes, so that the work can commence on this great and necessary public enterprise.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, I cannot yield the right of way in the Senate to any bill when a public appropriation bill such as this is demands consideration at this stage of the session. I simply ask that the bill may be taken up and put upon its passage, and then the Senate can determine what it will take up for itself. I trust that the Post-Office appropriation bill may be made the order of business.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that at the earliest possible moment, and especially at the time when the Senator from Pennsylvania proposes to yield the floor on the conclusion of the bill about being taken up, that I shall insist that the Indian severalty bill, already thoroughly discussed, has precedence over any other measure for consideration by the Senate, and shall ask that that bill be taken up and considered. The bill is one of the most important that has been before the Senate during the session. It is one that is asked for by one of the Departments of the Government as absolutely necessary to the proper administration of an important branch of its affairs. It is demanded by the condition of the Indians and by the public policy which should be subserved in administering the affairs of the Indians. We have had the bill before the Senate some ten or twelve days. It has been thoroughly and exhaustively discussed in all its branches and provisions, and it does seem to me that now is the time to dispose of it, unless we intend to have a repetition of the same discussion and another useless consumption of time over the same measure at the next session of Congress.

With reference to the bill of the honorable Senator from Indiana, while it is important, it seems to me—and I say it with due deference to that gentleman's opinion—that that bill is insignificant in comparison with the bill that I now say should be proceeded with at the first moment the Senate can take it up.

I will state, further, that the Indian severalty bill has been yielded repeatedly in deference to the views of Senators presenting appropriation bills to the Senate. I have antagonized no appropriation bill. The bill has been yielded repeatedly to other measures that it seemed proper should come before the Senate; and I would submit that it is entitled by the extension of the proper courtesy of the Senate to the next place for consideration.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state in reference to the observation submitted by the Senator from Florida that it is probably due to the Senate to state what took place on the 7th of February about the bill referred to by the Senator from Florida, being the bill (S. No. 1210) for the relief of certain officers of the Navy. It appears from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that after considerable discussion touching the order of business, the Senator from California [Mr. FARLEY] said:

> The understanding is that the unfinished business retains its place after the bill is over.

Referring, as the Chair understands, to the pension appropriation bill, and the unfinished business being, as the Chair infers from this statement in the RECORD, the bill concerning naval officers.

> The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the understanding.

The present occupant of the chair thinks, according to his recollection, that these understandings do not go on the Journal, and therefore it is only by the general consent of the Senate that the business laid aside in that way again comes up; and so the Chair felt it to be its duty to put the question on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania. The Chair states this in explanation of the ruling that he made a little while ago in regard to the point raised by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. As I said, I have no wish to antagonize any of the important appropriation bills; but when the understanding of the Senate was announced by the Chair, as we find it recorded and as reiterated by the Chair now, I thought it was due to me and to the Senator from California that some notice should be taken of the claim of the bill which was under consideration when that agreement was made.

I say now that it will not take a great while, in my judgment, to dispose of the bill. The Senator from New Hampshire has already made an argument in the case against the claims of these officers, and I thought that in justice to the Naval Committee, of which I am an unpretentious and humble member, something ought to be said, or at least an opportunity should be given to say it, on the other side; and I expected after the pension bill was over that we would come back, according to the agreement here recorded, and consider the bill.

Mr. WALLACE. I have no desire to interfere with any understanding made in the Senate. I am only endeavoring to perform my duty, as I see it, in regard to public business. I want no extra session, and I am compelled to press the bill now in my charge. I am sure the Senate does not desire that we should protract these appropriation bills and run the risk of an extra session. Therefore I feel compelled to insist upon my motion. I have no objection that the understanding which appears upon the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD may continue, but I ask the Senate to take up the Post-Office appropriation bill with that understanding, if it is so understood.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. With the understanding that this order shall be continued as it is now, I have no objection.

Mr. VOORHEES. What is the understanding?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania suggests, the Chair will be allowed to state, that the bill respecting certain naval officers, Senate bill No. 1210, be taken up after the disposition of the appropriation bill.

Mr. VOORHEES. It will be entirely impossible to get such an understanding if it requires unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. It does not.

Mr. VOORHEES. We shall have a vote, then, on it. I do not know who is the majority of the Senate, the Senator from Florida or myself.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. If the Senator will listen one moment to understand the status of this case, I think he will not insist on the objection.

Mr. VOORHEES. I understand it pretty well. I understand that it will lead to a protracted and acrimonious debate.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. That is not the question now. There is an understanding already had. The Senate has already indicated through its presiding officer that this measure should come up, because we had it under consideration when the pension appropriation bill was called up. It was then the regular order, and by general consent, as here recorded, it was agreed that after the pension bill was disposed of the consideration of that bill should be resumed. The consent of the Senate was given to that agreement, and it is so recorded, and if the Senate goes back on its own consent I have no more to say.

Mr. VOORHEES. As a matter of course the Senator from Florida knows I would not stand one moment against what is recorded as the unanimous understanding of the Senate; but if that bill is to be taken up I should like to have a unanimous understanding that the Senate, each member of which is as much interested as I am in the Library question, shall take up and consider the Library bill. If I can have that understanding, I will be content. I ask for that unanimous consent, Mr. President, if I have the right and power to do it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Florida, the Chair understands, ask for an understanding that after the disposition of the Post-Office appropriation bill Senate bill No. 1210 shall be considered, and the Senator from Indiana asks that there be a unanimous understanding that after Senate bill No. 1210 shall have been disposed of the Library building bill may be considered.

Mr. WALLACE. No, Mr. President, I simply desire to take up the Post-Office appropriation bill and allow the Senate to dispose of its own understandings as they are found upon the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I am content that the bill of the Senator from Florida may have its position when it comes to that point, but I ask that the appropriation bill, which has the right of way, be taken up unfettered with conditions of any kind.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not want to displace the bill of the Senator from Florida; I do not want to violate what he supposes to have been the understanding of the Senate; but I do want the Senate to indicate its purpose, if possible, to take up the Library building bill immediately thereafter. I do not want to antagonize the Senator from Pennsylvania with his appropriation bill, of course. I do not think that the bill which I am interested in will take much time. If I could have such an understanding I would be glad to have it.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the question. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania to proceed to the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill; pending which the Senator from Florida asks that there be a unanimous understanding (which does not by the course of practice go upon the Journal, but only depends upon the will of the Senate afterward) that Senate bill No. 1210 be considered; and then the Senator from Indiana asks a similar understanding that after that the Library building bill shall be considered. The Chair will ask for an expression of assent first to the application of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. With due deference to the Chair I will say that in asking the consent of the Senate to my proposition I am only asking that it shall remain by the assent already given. It is not an original proposition. The assent of the Senate has been already given, and I am only asking that it shall keep its faith. This measure was under consideration, and those representing the Naval Committee yielded to the Senator from California to call up the pension bill, with the understanding on the RECORD here that when the consideration of that bill was terminated this bill should resume its place, and the Senate assented to that unanimously. I am willing that the appropriation bill referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania shall be considered, but I still insist that the original assent of the Senate given in this case shall be carried out.

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to call the attention of the Senate, while these various demands are being made upon it, to the fact that last week the Indian severalty bill was informally laid aside during the afternoon and a bill in which I feel an interest, Senate bill No. 1441, was taken up for consideration, and then at the request of many Senators I agreed that it should go over upon an agreement on all sides by unanimous consent that it should be taken up immediately after the Indian severalty bill, which was informally that day laid aside. I desire to say to all the gentlemen who are asking unanimous consent, that this consent has been already given to me, and as soon as I get the opportunity, after the Indian severalty bill comes up, I shall insist upon it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think that the request of the Senator from Florida is perfectly just and reasonable. The bill which he advocates was before the Senate on Saturday, and it was laid aside on Monday with the understanding that it would come up after the bill then before the Senate was disposed of. He is not asking for a new agreement, but merely asks that the agreement which the Senate had previously made be carried out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida that after the disposition of the Post-Office appropriation bill Senate bill No. 1210 shall be considered? The Chair hears none; but the Chair will state that, as in all cases of this kind hitherto, it is an understanding of the Senate that is not entered upon the Journal, and it only binds Senators as they may feel themselves obliged to observe it. Then the Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent that after Senate bill No. 1210 shall have been disposed of the Library building bill may be taken up. Is there objection?

Mr. COKE. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made. The question now is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania to proceed to the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill (H. R. No. 6972) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and twenty-seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 9, 1881.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ATKINS. I call for the regular order.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is the regular order?

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the morning hour for the call of committees for reports.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees for reports.

The SPEAKER. This will require a vote of two-thirds.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Speaker, I intended, as I gave notice heretofore, that I would call up the rule touching the order of business reported on Monday from the Committee on Rules this morning. But in my judgment the legislative bill may in this hour be disposed of, and therefore I will waive the privilege of calling up that order this morning; but now give notice that I will call it up for consideration immediately after the declaration of the result of the count of the electoral votes for President and Vice-President.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to know whether the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] has the right to call up that rule at any time?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine does not now call up the rule for consideration. When the point arises, if the gentleman from Illinois chooses to make it, the Chair will then decide.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I give notice, then, I shall make the point of order against it at that time.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the legislative appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. CARLISLE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 7101) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes. The Clerk will resume the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the office of the Commissary-General: One chief clerk, at $2,000; one clerk of class 4; three clerks of class 3; four clerks of class 2; ten clerks of class 1; two clerks, at $1,000 each; one assistant messenger, two laborers, and two watchmen; in all, $31,680: Provided, That the Secretary of War, if the public necessity requires it, may detail not exceeding ten enlisted men for clerical service in this division.

Mr. ATKINS. I offer the following amendment to this paragraph:

On page 51, in line 1240, strike out the word "division" where it occurs and insert "bureau" in lieu thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For contingent expenses of the Adjutant-General's Office, in the old Navy Department building and in the building on F street above Seventeenth street, including fuel, light, heating apparatus, matting, cleaning, labor, and incidental items of care of two floors of the old Navy Department building, $2,800.

Mr. ATKINS. I offer an amendment to this paragraph.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

On page 54, lines 1318 and 1319, strike out the words "and in the building on F street above Seventeenth street;" and in line 1322 strike out the word "eight" and insert the word "five."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the rent of that portion of the building on the northeast corner of Twelfth street and Pennsylvania avenue, Washington, District of Columbia, now occupied by the Pension Office, or any other fire-proof building or buildings that the Secretary of the Interior may select, $24,000; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to contract with the owner of said building or buildings for the rent thereof to the Government, at a rate not exceeding $24,000 per year, from June 30, 1881, with the privilege for four years from June 30, 1882, at the same rate, contingent upon the making by Congress of the necessary appropriation.

Mr. ATKINS. I offer the following amendment to this paragraph:

In line 1527, after the word "or," where it occurs, insert the word "other."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Indian Office:

For compensation of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, $3,500; chief clerk, $2,000; one financial clerk, at $2,000; five clerks of class 4; eight clerks of class 3; one stenographer, at $1,600; twelve clerks of class 2; ten clerks of class 1; thirteen clerks at $1,000 each; eight copyists, at $900 each; one messenger; one assistant messenger; and two laborers; in all, $82,780.

Mr. ATKINS. I offer the following amendment to this paragraph:

In line 1582, after the word "dollars," where it occurs, strike out the word "five" and insert "one principal book-keeper, $1,800; four."

This simply changes the title of one of these clerks to that of principal book-keeper. It does not increase the salary but simply designates him as book-keeper and leaves the number of clerks the same as before.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pension Office:

For compensation of the Commissioner of Pensions, $4,000; deputy commissioner, $2,400; chief clerk, $2,000; medical referee, $2,250; forty-five clerks of class 4; seventy-five clerks of class 3; one hundred clerks of class 2; one hundred and forty-eight clerks of class 1; ten clerks, at $1,000 each; thirty copyists, at $900 each; one engineer, at $1,200; one assistant engineer, at $1,000; one messenger and twelve assistant messengers; and for ten laborers and four watchmen; in all, $586,410.

Mr. COFFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to this paragraph:

In line 1597 strike out the words "forty-five clerks of class 4" and insert "thirteen chiefs of division, at $2,250 each; thirty-two clerks of class 4."

Mr. ATKINS. I raise the point of order that the amendment increases expenditures and changes existing law.

Mr. COFFROTH. This is a very important amendment, and should be adopted in the interest of the Pension Bureau. The next paragraph appropriates $40,000 for investigating attempts at fraud. There might be $10,000 stricken out from that appropriation, for the reason that by the report of the Commissioner of Pensions it appears but $26,000 of this money was spent last year. When we reach that paragraph I shall move to strike out $40,000 and insert $30,000. Therefore I submit that the proposition, taken altogether, is in the interest of economy.

Mr. ATKINS. I cannot call to mind, Mr. Chairman, at what time the salaries of the clerks were fixed; I think thirty, or forty, or fifty years ago. Since the passage of that original act the clerks of class 4 have received $1,800.

Mr. BAKER. The salaries were fixed last in the Revised Statutes.

Mr. ATKINS. I am aware of that. But when the clerks were originally organized as first, second, third, and fourth class clerks, the salaries were fixed at $1,200, $1,400, $1,600, and $1,000, and those salaries never have been changed from the time they were first organized until this time. The chiefs of divisions generally receive $2,200 or $2,250 and sometimes $2,500. And I suppose, although the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COFFROTH] has not fixed any sum in his amendment for the salaries of these chiefs of divisions, they would receive $2,250, which will be an increase of $450 for each chief of division over and above the sum which these fourth-class clerks now receive.

I say there is no law which authorizes the giving these additional chiefs of divisions to the Pension Bureau. And besides, if I am permitted to come to the merits of the question, I want to say to this House the Commissioner of Pensions was before the Committee on Appropriations, and if we understood him aright he was entirely satisfied with the bill as it has been presented to the House.

Mr. COFFROTH. I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee if the Revised Statutes do not fix the compensation of the chiefs of divisions at $2,250; if that is not fixed as the compensation for clerks who act as chiefs of divisions?

Mr. ATKINS. I believe that is the fact. So much the worse for the gentleman's position.

Mr. COFFROTH. I wish to state that the Commissioner of Pensions has divided off the business of his bureau into thirteen divisions, and there are thirteen clerks who are acting as the principal examiners or chiefs of divisions. But under this appropriation bill they get only $1,800 a year, while if they were put in here as chiefs of division they would, under the Revised Statutes, get $2,250 a year.

Mr. ATKINS. It may be that the Commissioner of Pensions has for his own convenience divided up his work and made chiefs of divisions arbitrarily. But it is not a fact that the duties of each division are equally onerous. The duties of some of those divisions are much more onerous than of others. Yet the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes to pay all the chiefs of divisions the same sum.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any question about the fact that this amendment proposes to change existing law?

Mr. ATKINS. Not at all. I have been merely discussing a little the merits of the question in order to satisfy the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is compelled to sustain the point of order, upon the ground that the amendment changes existing law and does not retrench expenditures. It is not sufficient to make the amendment in order that it does not increase expenditures. If it changes existing law it must actually retrench expenditures to be in order under the third clause of Rule XXI.

Mr. ATKINS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 1602 and 1603 strike out the words "one assistant engineer at $1,000."

Mr. BAKER. I desire to hear some explanation of the reason why this assistant engineer should be stricken out.

Mr. ATKINS. This appears in the bill by mistake. It was not estimated for and I propose to strike it out.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For contingent and miscellaneous expenses of the Patent Office, namely: For construction and repair of model-cases, stationery, portfolios for drawings, furniture, and labor connected therewith, repairing, papering, painting, plumbing, gas-fitting, carpets, ice, advertising moneys refunded, printing engraved patent-heads, paper for the same, international exchanges, and other contingencies, $25,000.

Mr. VANCE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 1663 insert as follows:

"For preparing, under the direction of the Commissioner of Patents, a classified abridgment of all letters-patent of the United States the sum of $10,000: Provided, That said abridgment shall be printed and one copy of each shall be furnished to each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress; one copy to each of the eight libraries to be designated by each Senator, Representative, and Delegate, and two copies to Library of Congress; also to such foreign governments as the Commissioner of Patents may designate. Copies may also be sold at the cost of printing, and the sums received for such sales shall be paid into the Treasury.

Mr. ATKINS and Mr. BAKER made the point of order that the amendment changed existing law and did not retrench expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For photolithographing or otherwise reproducing copies of drawings destroyed or damaged by fire or otherwise exhausted, including pay of temporary draughtsmen, $30,000; the work of said photographing, or otherwise producing plates and copies, referred to in this and the two preceding paragraphs, to be done under the supervision of the Commissioner of Patents, and in the city of Washington, if it can be there done at reasonable rates; and the Commissioner of Patents, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, is authorized to make contracts therefor.

Mr. WARNER. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At line 1678, after the word "at," insert the word "as;" and in line 1679, after the word "rates," insert the words "as elsewhere."

Mr. WARNER. The chairman of the committee, I understand, accepts this amendment.

Mr. BAKER. Now I desire to hear read that portion of the paragraph as it will read if amended. I reserve the right to raise the point of order, if there be one, on the amendment after hearing it read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The work of said photographing, or otherwise producing plates and copies, referred to in this and the two preceding paragraphs, to be done under the supervision of the Commissioner of Patents, and in the city of Washington, if it can be there done at as reasonable rates as elsewhere.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment is clearly not right. I desire to be heard on the point of order first, and afterward on the merits, if the point of order is not sustained.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to yield for a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I yield for that motion.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CARLISLE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union having had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 7101) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I submit the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the privileges of the floor of the Hall of the House of Representatives be accorded to ladies during the count of the electoral vote for President and Vice-President.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that in accordance with the resolution adopted yesterday there was a space set apart in the galleries sufficient to accommodate three hundred and fifty persons; but direction was given in that resolution for the issuing of seven hundred and fifty tickets of admission. The consequence is that a large number of persons who were intended to be included in the scope of the resolution of yesterday have not been able to find seats. The resolution in regard to the issuance of tickets has been literally executed.

Mr. SPRINGER. The resolution should be amended so as to apply only to those holding tickets.

Mr. ROBINSON. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROBINSON. I would inquire of the Chair if under Rule XXXIV the Chair can entertain the resolution of the gentleman from Mississippi?

The SPEAKER. It can be entertained by unanimous consent.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Chair direct Rule XXXIV to be read?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will do so.

The Clerk read as follows:

The persons hereinafter named, and none other, shall be admitted to the Hall of the House, or rooms leading thereto, namely: The President and Vice-President of the United States and their private secretaries, judges of the Supreme Court, members of Congress and members-elect, contestants in election cases during the pendency of their cases in the House, the Secretary and Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, heads of Departments, foreign ministers, governors of States, the Architect of the Capitol, the Librarian of Congress and his assistant in charge of the law library, such persons as have, by name, received the thanks of Congress, ex-members of Congress who are not interested in any claim or directly in any bill pending before Congress, and clerks of committees when business from their committee is under consideration; and it shall not be in order for the Speaker to entertain a request for the suspension of this rule or to present from the Chair the request of any member for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts, as the Chair understands, makes the point of order that it is not competent for the Speaker to entertain such a request.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I would inquire of the Chair if the rule just read by the Clerk applies to any sessions of this House except a legislative session, or a purely House session?

Mr. ROBESON. Certainly not.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does it apply to a joint session of the two Houses of Congress? I think it does not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] proposes a substitute for the resolution of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON.] The Chair would suggest that whatever action is taken by the House must be taken immediately.

Mr. SPRINGER. I offer a substitute for the resolution and call the previous question on the resolution and amendment.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper be directed to admit to the floor of the House ladies having tickets issued for the members' gallery during the joint session for the count of the electoral vote.

The SPEAKER. That is to provide for the families of Senators, Members, and Delegates. The Chair will admit the resolution under the circumstances, and believes that the rule just read does not apply to a joint convention of the two Houses.

Mr. HEILMAN. I object to the resolution and want to adhere to the programme. My folks came up here according to the programme and I had to turn them off, and I know several others who are in the same situation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair admits the resolution under the circumstances.

The substitute was agreed to, and the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the House now take a recess until one minute before twelve o'clock.

Mr. SPRINGER. Would it not be in order to inform the Senate that we are now ready to receive them?

The SPEAKER. The concurrent resolution requires that the two Houses should meet in joint convention at twelve o'clock to-day, and the Chair is advised that the Senate is now on its way to the Hall of the House.

The motion of Mr. ATKINS was agreed to; and the House accordingly (at eleven o'clock and fifty-eight minutes a. m.) took a recess.

At eleven o'clock and fifty-nine minutes a. m., the recess having expired, the House resumed its session.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to announce that the two front rows of seats on the right and on the left of the Chair have been reserved for Senators during the session of the joint convention of the two Houses.

COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTE.

At twelve o'clock m. the Doorkeeper announced the Senate of the United States.

The Senate entered the Hall preceded by its Sergeant-at-Arms and headed by the Vice-President and the Secretary of the Senate, the members and officers of the House rising to receive them.

The Vice-President took his seat as presiding officer of the joint convention of the two Houses, the Speaker occupying the chair on the left of the Vice-President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The two Houses have assembled in pursuance of the Constitution that the votes may be counted and declared for President and Vice-President of the United States for the term of four years from the 4th day of March, 1881. It becomes my duty under the Constitution, as the President of the Senate, to open the certificates of election of the several States of the nation, in the presence of the two Houses, and I now proceed to discharge that duty. The tellers appointed on the part of the Senate and the House will please take their seats.

Senators HAMLIN and THURMAN, the tellers appointed on the part of the Senate, and Mr. HOUSE and Mr. CROWLEY, the tellers appointed on the part of the House, took their seats at the Clerk's desk, at which the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House also occupied seats.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. I open the package purporting to contain the certificates of election of the State of Alabama and hand those certificates to the tellers to be reported.

Senator HAMLIN (one of the tellers) read in full the certificate of the vote of the State of Alabama, giving 10 votes for Winfield S. Hancock, of the State of Pennsylvania, for President of the United States, and 10 votes for William H. English, of the State of Indiana, for Vice-President of the United States.

Mr. HOUSE (one of the tellers) then read at length the certificate of the vote of the State of Arkansas, and announced the electoral vote of that State for President and Vice-President.

Senator THURMAN (one of the tellers) then read the certificate of the vote of the State of California, and announced the electoral vote of that State for President and Vice-President.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, I suggest that, by unanimous consent of the joint convention, the reading of the formal parts of the certificates be omitted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That may be done by unanimous consent, and was the course pursued at the counting in 1857. Is there objection to the course suggested by the gentleman from Texas? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and that course will be pursued.

Senator EDMUNDS. I would suggest, in view of the unanimous consent that has been given, that the tellers might examine the certificates as to their formalities, and the Chair could pass down in advance one of the certificates in order that it might be examined by the tellers, while one of the tellers is announcing the vote of the State preceding.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will adopt the suggestion.

The tellers then proceeded to announce the electoral votes of the States of Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, and Florida.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair now hands to the tellers the certificate of election of the State of Georgia.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for the reading of that certificate in full.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The certificate will be read at length.

Mr. CROWLEY (one of the tellers) then proceeded to read in full the certificate of the vote of the State of Georgia, but before concluding,

Mr. SPRINGER said: Mr. President, I withdraw my demand for the reading in full of the certificate of the State of Georgia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The further reading will be omitted, and the result of the vote will be announced.

Mr. CROWLEY (one of the tellers) then announced the result of the vote of the State of Georgia for President and Vice-President of the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It appearing from the certificates just read that the votes of the State of Georgia were cast on a day other than that fixed by act of Congress in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States, the result of those certificates will not be recorded until, in the language of the concurrent resolution under which the count proceeds, "it shall appear whether the counting or omitting to count such votes will essentially change the result of the election." When that fact shall appear the record will be made agreeably to the provisions of the concurrent resolution.

The certificates of the remaining States were then opened, and the votes announced as they appear in the following statement submitted by the tellers:

When the votes of all the States had been severally announced,

Senator THURMAN (one of the tellers) said: The tellers report that the whole number of the electors appointed to vote for President of the United States is 369, of which a majority is 185. Were the votes of electors for the State of Georgia, cast on the second Wednesday of December, 1880, being the 8th day of said month, to be counted, the result would be: For James A. Garfield, of the State of Ohio, for President of the United States, 214 votes, and for Winfield S. Hancock, of the State of Pennsylvania, for President of the United States, 155 votes. If not counted, the result would be: For James A. Garfield, for President of the United States, 214 votes, and for Winfield S. Hancock, for President of the United States, 144 votes. In either event James A. Garfield has received a majority of the votes of the whole number of electors appointed.

And the state of the vote for Vice-President of the United States, is as follows: The whole number of the electors appointed to vote for Vice-President of the United States is 369, of which a majority is 185. Were the votes of electors for the State of Georgia, cast on the second Wednesday of December, 1880, being the 8th day of said month, to be counted, the result would be: For Chester A. Arthur, of the State of New York, for Vice-President of the United States, 214 votes, and for William H. English, of the State of Indiana, for Vice-President of the United States, 155 votes. If not counted, the result would be: For Chester A. Arthur, for Vice-President of the United States, 214 votes, and for William H. English, for Vice-President of the United States, 144 votes. In either event Chester A. Arthur has received a majority of the votes of the whole number of electors appointed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Wherefore, I do declare that James A. Garfield, of the State of Ohio, having received a majority of the votes of the whole number of electors appointed, is duly elected President of the United States for four years commencing on the 4th day of March, 1881.

And I do further declare that Chester A. Arthur, of the State of New York, having received a majority of the votes of the whole number of electors appointed, is duly elected Vice-President of the United States for four years commencing on the 4th day of March, 1881. [Loud applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

The business for which the joint convention of the two Houses assembled having been completed, the Senate will return to its Chamber.

The Senate accordingly retired from the Hall; and (at one o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the Speaker resumed the chair and called the House to order.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the House take a recess for ten minutes.

The motion was not agreed to.

LAND AT FORTRESS MONROE FOR HOTEL PURPOSES.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. No. 1843) to authorize the Secretary of War to grant the use of certain land at Fortress Monroe, Virginia, for the erection of a hotel, be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. HOUSE. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion for a moment.

Mr. ATKINS. For what purpose?

Mr. HOUSE. In order that the report of the tellers in relation to the count of the electoral vote may be submitted.

Mr. ATKINS. I withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. HOUSE. I submit the report which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The report of the tellers on the part of the House recording the vote as counted and declared for President and Vice-President of the United States will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The tellers on the part of the two Houses report that they have counted the votes of all the States cast for President and Vice-President of the United States of America for the constitutional term of four years from the 4th day of March, 1881, and find that on the first Wednesday in December, 1880, the electors of all the States assembled in their respective States, being the day prescribed by law for the assembling of the electors, except the electors of the State of Georgia. That of those who assembled and cast their votes on the said first Wednesday in December, 1880, James A. Garfield, of the State of Ohio, received 214 votes for President of the United States; Winfield S. Hancock, of the State of Pennsylvania, received 144 votes for the same office.

That for Vice-President of the United States Chester A. Arthur, of the State of New York, received 214 votes; William H. English, of the State of Indiana, received 144 votes.

That from the report of the electors of the State of Georgia, it appears that the electors of that State assembled in Atlanta, the capital of that State, on the second Wednesday of December, 1880, being the 8th day of said month, and, so assembled on that day, did cast the electoral votes of that State, 11 for Winfield S. Hancock, of the State of Pennsylvania, for President of the United States, 11 for William H. English, of Indiana, for Vice-President of the United States.

From all of which it appears that the whole number of electors appointed to vote for President and Vice-President of the United States is 369, of which a majority is 185. Were the votes of electors of the State of Georgia, cast on the second Wednesday of December, 1880, being the 8th day of said month, counted, the result would be: For James A. Garfield, of the State of Ohio, for President of the United States, 214 votes, and for Winfield S. Hancock, of the State of Pennsylvania, for President of the United States, 155 votes; and for Chester A. Arthur, of the State of New York, for Vice-President of the United States, 214 votes, and for William H. English, of Indiana, for Vice-President of the United States, 155 votes. If the votes of the electors of the State of Georgia, cast as aforesaid, were not counted, the result would be: For President of the United States, James A. Garfield, of the State of Ohio, 214 votes; Winfield S. Hancock, of the State of Pennsylvania, 144 votes; for Vice-President of the United States, Chester A. Arthur, of the State of New York, 214 votes; William H. English, of the State of Indiana, 144 votes. In either event James A. Garfield, of the State of Ohio, has received for President of the United States, and Chester A. Arthur, of the State of New York, has received for Vice-President of the United States, respectively, a majority of the votes of the whole number of electors appointed.

H. HAMLIN,
A. G. THURMAN,
Tellers on the part of the Senate.
JNO. F. HOUSE,
RICHARD CROWLEY,
Tellers on the part of the House of Representatives.

Mr. CROWLEY. I now offer the following resolution——

Mr. CONGER. Before that resolution is read I desire to ask the gentleman who made the last report whether he followed the usual form?

Mr. HOUSE. Yes, sir; it was prepared according to the usual form.

Mr. CONGER. Whether he followed the usual form in this respect in saying we have counted the electoral vote, or whether the other form was not the electoral votes were counted?

Mr. HOUSE. No; I think this is the usual form.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is the exact form adopted in the year the resolution as agreed to between the two Houses was passed.

Mr. CONGER. It was in reference to that form I asked whether it was the same.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the House of Representatives having met the Senate, in accordance with the fifth section of the act 1st March, 1792, relative to the election of President and Vice-President of the United States, and the electoral votes having been opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses of Congress, and counted by the tellers appointed on the part of the two Houses, and it appearing that the whole number of electors appointed to vote for President and Vice-President of the United States is 369, of which a majority is 185, and it further appearing that James A. Garfield, of Ohio, had received 214 votes for President of the United States, and that Chester A. Arthur, of New York, had received 214 votes for Vice-President of the United States, which number is a majority of the votes of the whole number of electors appointed, and the same having been duly declared by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the two Houses are of opinion that the Constitution and laws have been duly executed, and that no further declaration of these facts is necessary.

The resolution was adopted.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the preamble will be considered as adopted.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FRYE. I gave notice that I would call up the resolution reported by the Committee on Rules touching the order of business in the House immediately after the declaration of the electoral count, but as it will not take more than an hour or so to complete the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill I will waive it for the present, and now give notice I will call it up after the committee has finished that bill.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. NICHOLLS, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. I move the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. No. 7101) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, Mr. CARLISLE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose there was pending an amendment presented by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER,] upon which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] had made a point of order.

Mr. BAKER. And I desire, Mr. Chairman, to state that point of order. It is that it changes existing law and it does not appear on its face that it retrenches public expenditure. You will observe by examination of the clause of the appropriation bill for the current fiscal year, on page 25, that the phraseology of the existing law is identical with the text of the bill as it stands in the pending bill before this amendment was proposed.

You will further observe, Mr. Chairman, that the fourth section of the legislative appropriation bill for the current year repeals all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of that act. Therefore the law now is as it stands in the text of the bill reported from the Committee on Appropriations, and this amendment changes that existing law and does not on the face of it retrench expenditures.

Mr. WARNER. The gentleman from Indiana in making the point of order claims, as I understand him, that the language of this bill is exactly the language of the appropriation bill of last year and which became a law; that this changes the law to a certain extent without on its face reducing expenditures.

Mr. STEVENSON. I should like to know what the amendment is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 1678, after the word "at," insert the word "as," and after the word "rates" insert the words "as elsewhere;" so, after amended, it will read:

"For photolithographing or otherwise reproducing copies of drawings destroyed or damaged by fire or otherwise exhausted, including pay of temporary draughtsmen, $30,000; the work of said photographing or otherwise producing plates and copies referred to in this and the two preceding paragraphs to be done under the supervision of the Commissioner of Patents and in the city of Washington, if it can be there done at as reasonable rates as elsewhere; and the Commissioner of Patents, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, is authorized to make contracts therefor."

The CHAIRMAN. The effect of the amendment will be to permit this work to be done elsewhere than in the city of Washington, if it can be done as cheaply.

Mr. WARNER. That can be done now under the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to direct the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to the statement that the appropriation bill for the present year not only confines it to the city of Washington but repeals all laws inconsistent therewith, which is not always the case, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. WARNER. This bill does not as it now reads confine this work to the city of Washington. It is done in the city of Washington if it can be there done at reasonable rates. Now, my amendment simply defines what reasonable rates should be—rates as reasonable as elsewhere. The bill I consider does not limit it to Washington, and on its face I submit as reasonable as elsewhere is prima facie reduction of the cost.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Chairman, on this point of order I desire to say but one word. The Chair has called the attention of the gentleman from Ohio who offered the amendment to the existing law, which repealed all former laws inconsistent with its own provisions. That was done after due notice given and perfectly intelligently by the House, upon the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior, supported by the letter of the Commissioner of Patents. The House then did not act unadvisedly in adopting the present, the existing law, which repealed all other laws inconsistent with it for reasons which were fully explained in the communication of the Secretary of the Interior, as well as the letter of the Commissioner of Patents. Under that provision of the law, and in accordance with the facts which I have stated, I think the point of order of the gentleman from Indiana is good. The amendment proposed does not on its face tend to reduce expenditures, and it does most unquestionably change existing law under which this lithographing is to be done.

Mr. ATKINS. Outside of the question of its not retrenching expenditures, let us look into it a moment. I think it will be found that it is not practicable to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio——

Mr. WARNER. If the gentleman from Tennessee is going to discuss the merits of the proposition, I desire to be heard myself upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee will confine himself to the point of order.

Mr. ATKINS. I shall not enlarge upon the point of order, which has been thoroughly stated by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Mr. Chairman, it is apparent to me at least that the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio is clearly in the line of retrenchment. Why is it in the line of retrenchment? Because upon the face of the bill as it is here reported it proposes no standard or test of comparison. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio invites competition, and human experience shows that competition is always in the line of reduction of expenditures. It is manifest, Mr. Chairman, that the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio aims at a reduction of expenditures as much as any proposition can. It seems to me to do so clearly and unequivocally.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, I was not present when the proposition was made to offer this amendment; but the same question was raised here during last year when this same bill was before the House for consideration. It seems to me that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations should be willing to adopt the same provision that was adopted at that time. Simply say that this work may be done anywhere where the rates are satisfactory and where it can be done as well without specifying that it shall be done in Washington. I have constituents of my own in Boston who are able to do the work well and give satisfaction.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is just the trouble.

Mr. MORSE. That is the trouble exactly. I want all persons to have a fair chance in getting this work. I do not think it is right to compel the Secretary to do the work here alone——

Mr. BLACKBURN. It does not.

Mr. MORSE. It does in terms require the work to be done here, because the bill provides that it shall be done in Washington, if it can be done at reasonable rates. Now, I am no lawyer, but that is the clear meaning of it. Now, I see no reason, if it can be done at reasonable rates at other places, as reasonable rates, or perhaps more reasonable rates than it can be done at Washington, why it should be out of order to adopt this amendment. I say it is not fair to require it to be done here as this bill proposes. It should be permitted to be done anywhere where it can be done well and cheaply.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Chairman, I will say but a single word in conclusion upon the point of order. It seems to me that as far as the question is concerned as to the change of existing law, we are agreed. The gentleman offering the amendment and those who support it are agreed that it does change existing law. Now, I am willing to submit the whole question to the judgment of the Chair without another word as to whether it comes within the provision of the twenty-first rule in that it does retrench expenditures. It is not so shown on the face of it.

Mr. ATKINS. No sum is mentioned.

Mr. BLACKBURN. No sum is mentioned as being saved by this proposition, and it does not prima facie present a case of reduction of expenditures, and without doing that I hold that it is not in order under the terms of the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana insist upon his point of order?

Mr. BAKER. Most certainly, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman will examine the peculiar phraseology of the third subdivision of the twenty-first rule he will see that provision is made for amendments to a bill upon a report of a committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter, it being of course contemplated that such amendments are offered under the instructions of a committee. To this extent the provision of the rule seems to imply a limit to the power of individuals to offer such amendments; and without reading the rule or commenting further upon it, the Chair holds that under the provision to which reference is made the amendment is clearly not in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For surveyor-general of Minnesota, $2,000; and for the clerks in his office, $5,000.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "five," in line 1743, and insert the word "six;" so that it will read, "for the clerks in his office, $6,000."

Mr. CLYMER. I reserve the point of order upon that amendment.

Mr. DUNNELL. I conferred with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in relation to this item. I had intended to present that matter to the committee in person. Last year when this bill was before the committee I urged the necessity of an appropriation of $6,000. The estimate was $8,500. I was assured when I came here in November by the surveyor-general of the State that the business of his office was very much behind, and that there was an absolute necessity for a larger appropriation for the purpose of getting it up. I trust the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not insist upon what I think is not really a point of order. The gentleman from Tennessee will remember that I spoke to him about this matter.

Mr. CLYMER. I reserved the point of order until I could ascertain whether there was any necessity for an increase over the existing law. The gentleman from Minnesota has not shown, or if he did, in the confusion I have not heard him, any necessity for this increase.

Mr. DUNNELL. Last year the estimates were $7,500; this year they are $8,500. The increase in the estimate is an evidence there is a demand for a greater appropriation; and I trust the point of order will not be insisted on.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the existing law?

Mr. CLYMER. The existing law makes it $5,000. I must insist on the point of order.

Mr. ATKINS. I will read what is provided in the appropriation act for the current year:

For surveyor-general of Minnesota, $2,000; and for the clerks in his office, $5,000

This bill is the same as the existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. Are the salaries fixed by law?

Mr. ATKINS. The gross sum is the same in the act for this year as it is in the present bill.

Mr. BAKER. I do not think there is anything in the point of order, for this reason: this is a gross appropriation for a given service, without being limited to any particular number of individuals for the accomplishment of that service. It is simply an appropriation from year to year of a gross sum for the employment of clerical labor to accomplish a particular end.

The CHAIRMAN. But is there not a statute which authorizes the employment of those clerks? Or does that depend upon the annual appropriation bill?

Mr. BAKER. There is no law, so far as I am advised, except the annual appropriation bill. From year to year that provides a gross sum for the employment of clerks in these several land offices. If there is any other law than that it would be repealed by our annual appropriation bills, for the reason that if there was a certain number of clerks provided for by law, we have from year to year, as the chairman will recollect, cut down the estimates for this clerical force, and have supplemented that by a repealing clause at the end of the appropriation bill. But this is not a case of that kind; and I submit that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. CLYMER. In justice to the chairman of the committee and myself, I wish to say when I made the point of order my impression was the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] had moved to increase the pay of the surveyor-general $1,000. That was clearly liable to the point of order. I understand now the proposition is merely to increase the amount appropriated for the clerical force. That, I think, is not liable to the point of order.

Mr. BAKER. I hope the increase will be allowed.

Mr. ATKINS. I read from section 2226 of the Revised Statutes:

There shall be allowed for the offices of the several surveyors-general, for clerk hire therein, such sums as may be appropriated for the purpose by Congress from year to year.

After the reading of that section, I think there is nothing in the point of order. But I want to ask the gentleman from Minnesota, as he is familiar with the operations of the land office in Minnesota, if he can tell us whether or not the business is increasing, and how far behind it is in the surveyor-general's office.

Mr. DUNNELL. It is very well known throughout the country there has been a very large increase in the land office of Minnesota for the last few years. I could hardly now tell how many thousands of entries are made under all the various acts of Congress in the public lands of that State. The surveys are now being made there, and the business of the office has been going behind from year to year. I was requested personally to urge upon Congress the increase of this amount. The estimate was $8,500. I only desire to increase the amount in the bill from $5,000 to $6,000. That sum is absolutely needed.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to say, so far as I am concerned, as the sum fixed in the bill is $3,500 below the estimate, I am willing the gentleman's amendment should be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. As the point of order is not insisted on, the question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

For First Assistant Postmaster-General, $3,500; chief clerk, while the office is held by the present incumbent, $2,500; three clerks of class 4; fourteen clerks of class 3; one clerk of class 3 to act as stenographer and Department telegraph operator; six clerks of class 2; twelve clerks of class 1; four clerks at $1,000 each; three assistant messengers; superintendent of blank agency, $1,800; assistant superintendent of blank agency, $1,600; four assistants to superintendent of blank agency, at $1,200 each; two assistants to superintendent of blank agency, at $900 each; one clerk, at $1,000; one assistant messenger; three laborers, (for blank agency;) superintendent of free delivery, $2,100; one clerk of class 2, (office of superintendent of free delivery;) in all, $81,560.

Mr. ATKINS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 1802, after the words "chief clerk," strike out all that follows down to and including the word "dollars" in line 1804; and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$2,000, and while the office is held by the present incumbent $500 additional."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed and finished the reading of the bill.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the committee now rise and report the bill as amended.

Mr. COFFROTH. I ask permission to print certain remarks in regard to the pension portion of this bill.

There was no objection. [See Appendix.]

Mr. GILLETTE. Before the gentleman from Tennessee moves that the committee rise I desire to offer as an additional section what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Printing of national-bank notes:

No appropriation made by this bill shall be used to pay for preparing, printing, and delivering national-bank notes, but these expenses shall all be charged to the banks applying for the same.

Mr. ATKINS. I understand that to be the law now, that the banks all pay for the issuing of their own currency.

Mr. GILLETTE. That is not the law, I will state to the gentleman; but the Government pays for all the clerks employed in this service; it pays for all the printing, prepares the paper and delivers these notes to the banks without expense to them except the cost of the steel plates for printing. It is true we collect a small tax for the greatest bonus ever given by this Government to any class of people, but besides all that we prepare these notes at the expense of the Treasury.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. What is the point of order of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON?]

Mr. GILLETTE. The gentleman from Illinois has not made a point of order.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I will make the point of order when the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] gets through.

Mr. GILLETTE. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois that he may state what is his point of order.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I did not ask the gentleman to yield. Let him go ahead.

Mr. BLOUNT. I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to this bill. It belongs to the civil sundry appropriation bill. The appropriations for this purpose are all in that bill.

Mr. GILLETTE. The salaries of the officers of the Bureau of Printing and Engraving are provided for by this bill.

Mr. ATKINS. I will state to the gentleman from Iowa it will be more proper for him to offer his amendment to the sundry civil bill; because it is in that bill these expenses are provided for. It would be germane to that bill but not to this.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what the Chair was going to state to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GILLETTE. This bill does provide for some of those expenses, but if the point of order is maintained I will offer it upon the sundry civil appropriation bill——

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. As the amendment has been withdrawn, for the reason suggested, I have no desire to press my point of order upon it.

Mr. ATKINS. I now move that the committee rise and report the bill with amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CARLISLE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 7101) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. ATKINS. I call the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is first upon agreeing to the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole. Is a separate vote demanded on any of the amendments?

Mr. ATKINS. I desire none.

The SPEAKER. Then the amendments will be voted upon in gross.

The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole were then agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. ATKINS. I call the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 217, nay 1, not voting 74; as follows:

Mr. STONE. I am paired with Mr. MONEY; but, thinking he would vote for this bill, I have voted for it.

Mr. CONGER. My colleague, Mr. NEWBERRY, has been required to leave the House on account of ill-health.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LIGHT-HOUSE, ETC., NARRAGANSET BAY.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 7157) making an appropriation for the erection of a light-house and fog-bell on Whale Rock at the entrance of Narraganset Bay; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

W. P. WOOD.

Mr. DICKEY, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Claims the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury relative to the claim of W. P. Wood for compensation for capture of counterfeit plates, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. COVERT, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 7099) making appropriations for the Agricultural Department of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANDERSON and Mr. ATKINS reserved points of order on the bill.

PRINTING OF AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

Mr. COVERT also, by unanimous consent, reported back from the same committee the joint resolution (H. R. No. 373) relative to printing the Agricultural Report for the year 1880; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

ALPHABETICAL LIST OF PRIVATE CLAIMS.

Mr. DAVIS, of California, from the Committee on Accounts, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to have completed the digested summary and alphabetical list of the private claims presented to the House of Representatives, from the Forty-second to the Forty-sixth Congress inclusive; and the expenses of performing said work shall, under the direction of the Committee on Accounts, be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

The SPEAKER. The report accompanying this resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the resolution, report that in their judgment this work is a very useful and valuable one to the members and committees of the House. It is an alphabetical list of the private claims presented to the House, showing their nature, when and by whom they were presented and what action was had upon them. The work is completed to the end of the Forty-first Congress. The continuation to the end of the present Congress will involve a very inconsiderable expenditure of money, which will be at the same time judiciously invested. The committee therefore unanimously recommend the passage of the resolution.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the resolution be amended by inserting after the word "inclusive" the words "including the number of the report when made."

Mr. DAVIS, of California. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment of Mr. CONGER was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

RAILROAD FROM ATLANTIC SEABOARD TO MISSOURI RIVER.

Mr. ANDERSON, by unanimous consent, presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kansas in favor of the erection by the Government of a double-track freight railroad from the Atlantic sea-coast to the Missouri River; which was referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD. It is as follows:

Whereas the increase in the agricultural products of the West has been much faster than the means of transportation, thereby preventing a realization of the highest prices for our products by preventing their being marketed at a seasonable and most advantageous time; and

Whereas the complete and comprehensive view of this fact contains conclusive proof that a Government railroad would furnish prompter and cheaper means of transportation, affording to the people of the different sections of our country the opportunity for a more speedy interchange of their product and at a less cost, thereby solving the vexed question of adequate and cheap transportation; and as this question is in the highest degree national in character, and of peculiar importance not only to Kansas, but to all the agricultural States of the West: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the senate, (the house of representatives concurring therein,) First, that our Senators from this State be instructed and our Representatives in Congress requested to urge in the Congress of the United States the building of a double-track Government freight railroad from the sea-coast on the east to the Missouri River on the west, so as to make the main line accessible for commercial purposes to the people of all the States of the Mississippi Valley.

Second, that a copy of these resolutions be transmitted by the secretary of State to our Senators and Representatives in Congress with the earnest request that they urge the measures herein contained.

OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE,
State of Kansas, ss:

I, James Smith, secretary of State of the State of Kansas do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of the original resolution on file in my office, and I further certify that the same was adopted by the senate February 1, 1881, and was concurred in by the house February 3, 1881.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my official seal. Done at Topeka, this 4th day of February, A. D. 1881.

[SEAL.] JAMES SMITH,
Secretary of State.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPARKS. I move to proceed to the consideration of the House Calendar. I do this with a view of getting at the case of General Porter for consideration at this time.

Mr. KEIFER. We are unable to hear the gentleman's motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] moves to go to the consideration of the House Calendar, his object being to reach the Fitz-John Porter case.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to call up the resolution reported by me yesterday from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. SPARKS. Has that precedence over my motion?

Mr. REAGAN. I shall desire to antagonize the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, if that comes up, by a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the river and harbor bill.

The SPEAKER. The motion suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] would have precedence over the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not propose to do that to the exclusion of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.]

Mr. GUNTER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GUNTER. I wish to know whether it would be in order at this time to move to proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The motion to proceed to consider business on the Speaker's table would come in after the unfinished business. The first motion in order under the rules would be the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider revenue and appropriation bills; next would come the unfinished business; next the motion to go to business on the Speaker's table; and next the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] to proceed to consider bills on the House Calendar. When the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GUNTER] to go the Speaker's table is in order, that motion will take precedence of the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GUNTER. Then, as I understand, if the motion to go into Committee of the Whole should be negatived, the question of consideration would be between the business on the Speaker's table and the unfinished business which the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] would desire to bring up.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine, however, is demanding the consideration of a privileged question. The Chair will cause to be read a part of Rule XXVIII.

The Clerk read as follows:

No standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded or changed without one day's notice of the motion therefor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] made a point of order, or gave notice that he intended to make one, against the right of the gentleman to call up this resolution at any time.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. My point of order is, while it may be the right of the committee to make report, it has no right to call up that report at any time for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The rules do not in fact give the Committee on Rules the right to report at any time, and that point, to be effective, should have been made at the time the report was submitted. The Chair thinks, however, that it was not made. At any rate the report was allowed to come in, and under the operation of Rule XXVII, first clause, it has rested over one day. Although the rules do not give the Committee on Rules the right to report at any time, yet the practice of the House has been uniformly to allow the Committee on Rules to report at any time and to consider that report at any time when it was as to the manner of conducting the business of the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Does the Speaker decide that the gentleman has the right to call up this as a privileged question to the exclusion of the unfinished business?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the resolution is now properly before the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I submit, of course, to the decision of the Chair.

Mr. COX. I rise to a point of order. Was there any understanding that the gentleman from Maine should have this time to bring in his proposition?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman rises under his right.

Mr. COX. Have I the right to call up for consideration the apportionment bill?

The SPEAKER. If the House does not wish to consider the subject called up by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] the question of consideration can be raised against it. The gentleman from Texas stated that he did not antagonize it.

Mr. REAGAN. I stated that I would not antagonize the motion of the gentleman from Maine, but that I would antagonize any other measure which came up.

Mr. COX. I will antogonize the motion of the gentleman from Maine.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit that question whether the House will now proceed to the consideration of the resolution of the Committee on Rules as indicated by the gentleman from Maine.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 128, noes 21.

Mr. COX. I withdraw the question of consideration against the resolution of the gentleman from Maine.

The SPEAKER. The question of consideration having been withdrawn, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Maine.

BUSINESS BY UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

Mr. FRYE. I ask that the resolution be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, After Wednesday next, on each day of the remainder of the session other than the third Monday of February and the last six days, whenever on motion the morning hour shall be dispensed with by a two-thirds vote, that hour shall be set apart for the consideration of bills on the several calendars under the following regulations: The States and Territories shall be called in order as now provided for, and as each is called, one of its members shall be named by the Speaker, selected in alphabetical order, who may move the consideration of a bill; if objected to by five members rising in their seats it shall not be considered, otherwise the member making the motion shall be entitled to five minutes for explanation of his bill, or, instead thereof, to the reading of the report accompanying the same, and then a vote shall be taken. The call of States shall go on from day to day until completed, as above provided, and whenever all the Members and Delegates from any State or Territory have been named by the Speaker, such State or Territory shall thereafter be omitted from the call until all the Members and Delegates shall have been so named. Any member not answering as his name is called shall be considered to have waived his privilege.

Mr. FRYE. In the first line as printed the resolution reads, "after Wednesday next." To-day is Wednesday, and therefore I suggest by unanimous consent the resolution be modified so as to read "after to-day."

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. CONGER. I ask now that the limitation shall also extend to the reading of the report; for there may be reports which will take an hour to read. Let there be the same limitation on the reading of the report as there is on the debate.

Mr. FRYE. I accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Michigan, and will limit the reading of the report to five minutes, the same as an explanation.

The House on Monday, Mr. Speaker, by a very large majority appeared to be in favor of a resolution very much broader than this one which has been reported by the Committee on Rules. Now I wish to deal in all frankness with the House, and I desire to show them wherein this differs from the proposition on which a vote was had. The resolution offered on Monday provided that there should be one hour each day in which bills offered by members might receive consideration, subject to one objection, or could not be considered if there were one objection. This resolution provides that there shall not be any such hour as that unless first on motion made and by a two-thirds vote the morning hour is dispensed with. If that is done by a two-thirds vote then that hour shall be occupied by the business indicated in that resolution. So the House will see it is a very great restriction and limitation on the original resolution which was referred to the committee.

Again, that resolution made one objection fatal. The judgment of the Committee on Rules was that ought not to be so; that from mere caprice or temper, or something of that kind, one objection might be made and prevent the consideration of a bill which fairly should be considered. And the committee have provided that the bill shall be considered unless five gentlemen rising in their seats object to its consideration.

Then it provides further, in explanation of the bill so that the House may be secure, the bill is one entitled to consideration; that five minutes shall be given to such explanation of the bill by the gentleman who offers it, or instead of that, five minutes for the reading of the report accompanying the bill.

Again, sir, there is a restriction. The original resolution provided that any gentleman might offer a bill for consideration. That would be a bill which might not have been before the House. It might have been a bill which had received no consideration by any committee. The Committee on Rules have restricted that to bills on the several calendars, and these bills you will see have all been considered by the several committees and reported favorably to the House.

Now, sir, certain gentlemen are very desirous of keeping off to a certain extent that limitation, and putting in also bills on the Speaker's table. I do not know that there is any great objection to that, for such bills have been considered by a Senate committee. They have had consideration by the Senate and have been sent to the House and placed upon the Speaker's table. I have no authority, however, to accept the amendment. I understand one to that effect will be offered. My own objection, if I had one to it, would be that on any day after the unfinished business is disposed of a majority of this House is privileged to go to business on the Speaker's table, and when there they can take up the business on the table, bill after bill, in their legitimate order, and a majority of the House can pass every bill there unless a point of order should be raised against it, and then that bill, if subject to the point of order, as containing an appropriation, would be obliged, under the rule, to go to the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole. Being on that Calendar, it immediately comes under the provisions of the bill which we now present. And so, Mr. Speaker, it did not seem necessary in the mind of the committee to include bills upon the Speaker's table, together with bills upon the Calendars of the House, in this resolution.

Again, the resolution which was offered and referred to the Committee on Rules provided that the roll of the House should be called in alphabetical order of the members of the House and the Delegates. In the opinion of the Committee on Rules you never would reach the last part of the alphabetical list. Now, the last half of the names on that alphabetical list or roll might belong to a half dozen States, and so a half dozen States would be entirely shut out from the benefits which were intended to be conveyed equally to all. Therefore the committee were of opinion that such a method would work injustice. But under this resolution as now proposed the committee have thought better to provide a roll-call of the States and Territories just as we have it on Monday, and then when a State is called by the Speaker he first recognizes a member by name in alphabetical order from that State. Then if the State has a bill in which there is a general interest, a public bill, that State or that delegation could induce that particular member whose name was called to take up the State bill and present it to the House for consideration rather than his own private measure.

Mr. PAGE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FRYE. Certainly.

Mr. PAGE. Did the committee take into consideration the fact that one member might want to introduce a bill or offer a bill that a majority of the delegation from his State did not want?

Mr. FRYE. They did not.

Mr. PAGE. Why did they not provide that a bill, to be offered under the provisions of this proposition, should be determined by a majority of the delegation. An individual might offer a private bill rather than one in which his State was interested.

Mr. FRYE. In response to the question of the gentleman from California, I will say that the committee did not take this into consideration, because the original proposition provided that there should be a call of the roll of every member of the House, giving to each member, in that way, as nearly as practicable, the same privilege. But I have just shown that if called in that way the last half of the alphabet would not probably be reached during the session. Now, allow me to say if this rule is adopted by the House, and then without caprice, without temper, without any special antagonism it is carried out in the House, I have no doubt before the session closes that two-thirds of the members at least will have the privilege—at least two-thirds of those present—of offering a bill to the House for consideration.

Mr. WARNER. What about the other third?

Mr. FRYE. They will be obliged to go without, and they would have been compelled to do that if the proposition had been adopted to allow the roll to be called in alphabetical order and go through the list of members in that way.

Mr. MILLS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question in this connection. You contemplate by your resolution that five members objecting to a bill can kill it. Now if such a bill is called up a majority can pass it.

Mr. FRYE. No; the rule means, as I understand it—and I call the Speaker's attention to it, because I think it likely that there will be a ruling required upon it—when a State is called the gentleman first alphabetically on the list is named by the Speaker. If he desires it, he can take from the Calendar a bill and ask its immediate consideration; that then such bill shall be read for the information of the House, and then the objections, if any, are called for to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MILLS. These five objections can accomplish as much as a majority of the House in effectually disposing of a bill——

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to know if the person presenting a bill or calling up a bill for consideration is allowed five minutes in favor of it, what time is to be allowed to those who may object to the passage of it.

Mr. FRYE. No provision is made for allowing those who object to a bill to discuss it, and for this reason: if a bill is on the Calendar gentlemen have the opportunity to examine it, the committees have examined it, there is a report accompanying it; and the privilege is accorded by the committee in this report, or the power is given to five members to stop its consideration.

Mr. MILLS. That is the very point that I want to get at. Do you not propose to give the power of the majority of the House to five members. In other words, that five members can prevent the passage of a bill.

The SPEAKER. Only during that hour. It is proposed that five may object to its consideration. One can do that now.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. There is no provision or opportunity then for debate against it?

Mr. FRYE. No; none at all.

Mr. KEIFER. I desire to ask the gentleman this question: Suppose after the Speaker has called a State and designated the member who shall be entitled to ask the consideration of a bill, and after that five members object, I want to know whether that State is to be passed over?

The SPEAKER. In that case the gentleman who has been named loses his right.

Mr. KEIFER. I agree he loses his right. But does the State then lose the right to present a bill?

The SPEAKER. It does until another from that State is called in the order as required. The Chair will illustrate. When the State of Alabama is called, the gentleman from Alabama who will be named by the Speaker will be Mr. CLEMENTS. That gentleman calls up a bill. After the bill has been read if five members object then that bill could not be considered; that gentleman would have exhausted the privilege; and the State would lose its present privilege; and the Chair thinks he would be compelled to go next to the State of Arkansas.

Mr. KEIFER. It does not appear so by the rule in definite terms. That may be the proper construction of it.

The SPEAKER. That was the intention of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. KEIFER. I think that ought not to be the case.

Mr. VALENTINE. Then when the State of Nebraska, having but one member on this floor, is called, and I ask the House to consider a certain bill, and five members rise to object, the State loses its privilege and all right of recognition thereafter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman representing that State loses all right of recognition until the other two hundred and ninety-two members have had the same right as the gentleman from Nebraska. This resolution recognizes the right of individual membership.

Mr. KEIFER. This is important, and I desire it should be fully understood. I understood the Chair to say that in that case the call would pass to the next State. Now suppose the next State called was Ohio and a bill was called up by a member from that State and there were five objections to its consideration, I understand the Chair to say he would pass over the other nineteen members from Ohio and go to some other State.

The SPEAKER. That is the intention of the rule.

Mr. KEIFER. I think the rule should be amended so that that would not be the case.

The SPEAKER. If it was otherwise the whole roll of the State of Ohio might be called and twenty members of that State would each have the right if consecutively objected to continue to call up bills to the exclusion of the next State and all the States thereafter.

Mr. KEIFER. Only until a bill was considered; and then the State would have had its right after one bill was considered; and then the State drops out of the call. That is what I am endeavoring to suggest.

The SPEAKER. New York, for instance, under that arrangement might have thirty-three calls if as often objected by five members before the next State would be reached, and before the State of Ohio would be reached.

Mr. KEIFER. That would be because the thirty-three men from New York were so unfortunate as to find five persons objecting to each of their applications, because if one consideration came in, the whole State would be passed by. I think the resolution should be so amended as to give each State a right to consideration.

Mr. FRYE. I suppose I am holding the floor all this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has recognized the right of the gentleman from Maine to control the subject until the expiration of one hour. To whom does he yield?

Mr. FRYE. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] for a question.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I understand when a State is called the gentleman representing that State who happens to be first on the list alphabetically takes charge of all the business belonging to that State.

Mr. FRYE. The gentleman then does not understand the resolution aright.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Now suppose I introduce a bill into the House and have prepared myself to discuss it, and my colleague who has the floor has not informed himself on the subject; yet he alone is to speak for five minutes, and I who understand the bill am cut off from the privilege of discussing it at all.

Mr. FRYE. I think the gentleman from Mississippi is entirely wrong in his construction of the resolution. No gentleman from a State would be entitled to take entire charge of the business of that State. The gentleman who was first called from the State would have a right to present a bill for consideration; it might be a pension bill or any other private bill. The reason why States were selected was this: that a State might have a bill in which it had a profound interest; and if that were the case the delegation from that State would have an opportunity to induce the gentleman whose name was called first to take that bill in which the State was interested and offer that for consideration. It is an advantage which a State would have over the call of individual members under the ordinary rule in the House.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I cannot understand how that would be an advantage to me.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maine a question. I wish to know from the gentleman from Maine upon what theory he thinks two-thirds of the House will have an opportunity to ask for this privilege. If you deduct the five minutes allowed to each member to present his bill, if you deduct the time in reading the reports and the bill, you will find not more than six bills can be disposed of in a day. We have but nineteen legislative days in this session remaining; multiply six by nineteen, and you have one hundred and fourteen. Therefore, only one hundred and fourteen members will obtain the privilege of asking unanimous consent for the passage of their bills.

Mr. FRYE. And that is one hundred and fourteen more than would get any privilege unless you adopt this resolution.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Now we can ask the privilege at any time, and if there be no objection we can get it.

Mr. FRYE. There never was an instance known in which there was not an objection if you ask the consideration of a bill; and, besides, what the gentleman suggests can be done afterward, even if this resolution be adopted.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. This is in the interest of one hundred and fourteen members, who have the fortune to be from the smaller States or who appear highest alphabetically on the roll of their States.

Mr. FRYE. No, sir; it is in the interest of the business of this House.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. That is it.

Mr. FRYE. That is what it is.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Would it be in order for me now to move to lay this resolution on the table?

The SPEAKER. Such motion would have precedence.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Then I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. FRYE. I have not yielded the floor to the gentleman for any such purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] states he yielded for a question. The Chair will entertain the motion to lay on the table when the gentleman from Maine sits down.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I will not take the gentleman off the floor; but I give notice that I will submit that motion at the proper time.

Mr. SAPP. Will the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FRYE. Certainly.

Mr. SAPP. It is whether, if the name of a member is called and he fails to call up a bill, the State is then passed?

Mr. FRYE. It is.

Mr. ROBESON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. FRYE. Very well.

Mr. ROBESON. It is whether this proposition does not leave to every member of this House all the privileges he now has, and only adds to them some other privileges or facilities which are to be given by this proposed rule?

Mr. FRYE. Exactly.

Mr. ROBESON. And everything that we now get is in addition to what this proposes to give? Therefore if we get in one hundred and fourteen new propositions for consideration by the House, is not that a privilege for at least a portion of the members of this House which they would not get at all if it was not for this resolution?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. That is not correct.

Mr. ROBESON. And I want to ask the gentleman whether he does not think it wise, when we are going to do a practical thing, to take hold of that practical thing itself, and not bring up impracticable projects that will not amount to anything? Whether, if we do not get this measure of relief, the one hundred and fourteen members will be crowded out and nobody will get anything at all?

Mr. FRYE. The gentleman has stated it exactly.

Mr. WARNER. I want to ask the gentleman how we can give privileges to one hundred and fourteen members which they do not now have without denying to other members some privileges which they do have?

Mr. FRYE. The little experience which I had yesterday in connection with a small order touching the use of the galleries to-day—about two hundred suggestions of amendments having been made to me personally and about fifty more from the floor of the House—taught me a lesson. [Laughter.]

Now, I have no pride of opinion in this proposed rule, neither has the Committee on Rules any pride of opinion about it, and no care as to what the House may do with it. But if it be opened to amendment there will be no limit to the proposition of amendment. I desire to say to the House simply that before my hour has expired I propose to demand the previous question.

Many MEMBERS. Do it now.

Mr. FRYE. I cannot well do it now. If the previous question shall be sustained, then it will be within the power of any gentleman who is recognized, if he has an important amendment which he desires to have made to this rule, to move to recommit it, even while the demand for the previous question is pending or after it has been seconded, to recommit it with instructions to the Committee on Rules to report this proposition back with the amendment he shall indicate.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. Will not the gentleman now allow a single amendment, to insert the words "business on the Speaker's table," and have that amendment pending when the previous question is called?

Mr. FRYE. I have no authority to admit an amendment. The gentleman can move to recommit with instructions to report such an amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. We do not want to recommit it.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. FRYE. I have agreed to yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] for fifteen minutes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Allow me a moment before the gentleman yields.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FRYE. I will with pleasure.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] a question. I offered the resolution which has brought this subject before the House. Now I wish to know whether the gentleman will allow me at this time to offer a substitute for the rule proposed by the Committee on Rules, so that it may be pending.

Mr. FRYE. I cannot yield the floor for that purpose. If I were to yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] I would be equally obliged to yield to fifty other members. A motion to recommit with instructions can be made after the previous question has been demanded.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. One question.

Mr. FRYE. State it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I made a mistake as to the number of days left of this session. I find upon re-examination that only ten days will be left for the operation of this proposed rule, and if only six bills can be disposed of on each of those ten days, but sixty members of this House will enjoy the privilege proposed by this resolution.

Mr. BLACKBURN. One moment, if the gentleman pleases.

Mr. FRYE. With pleasure.

Mr. BLACKBURN. With a view of simplifying the settlement of the question now before the House, and without desiring to enter into any detailed statement, I will ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to yield for a motion to recommit this additional or new rule to the Committee on Rules, with instruction to report it back day after to-morrow morning, immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. ANDERSON and others. Oh, no!

Mr. FRYE. No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot yield for that purpose.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then the gentleman will permit me to say that as a member of the Committee on Rules I know nothing of this proposition. If it has been considered in a meeting of the Committee on Rules, I am not advised of it. I have not failed to attend any meeting of that committee that has been called. I do not mean to express myself as opposed to the resolution; I do not mean by any means to reflect upon the gentleman from Maine for reporting it; but I do mean to say that, as a member of that committee, I have not considered it in committee meeting; and if there has been a meeting of the Committee on Rules for the purpose of its consideration, I was not primarily advised of it, and have not been advised of it since. I feel that it is but reasonable to ask that the resolution shall be recommitted with the various amendments that have been proposed, in order that in the light of the opinions which have been expressed by members in the course of the discussion the Committee on Rules as a committee may act upon it deliberately and advisedly.

Mr. FRYE. A majority of the Committee on Rules has passed upon this proposed rule.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentleman answer me a question?

Mr. FRYE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Was a majority of the Committee on Rules present in a committee meeting?

Mr. FRYE. A majority of the Committee on Rules was not present at the meeting of the committee. I was notified to be present at a meeting of the committee. I was there.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I did not get any notice.

Mr. FRYE. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] came a few minutes afterward; and the vote of the committee, those present, was that the resolution be passed over till the gentlemen who were absent could be consulted and their views taken upon it. It was read to the gentleman from Georgia. The attention, I think, of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] was called to it. The "gentleman from Maine" tried to find the gentleman from Kentucky, and was not able to.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman from Maine will allow me, in justice to myself, to say that the records of Congress show that there has not been a day nor a roll-call on which I have been absent from my place in the House.

Mr. FRYE. I was not charging the gentleman with absence from the House.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It was not my fault that the gentleman did not find me.

Mr. FRYE. The majority of the Committee on Rules authorized this rule to be reported.

Mr. BLACKBURN. In committee meeting?

Mr. FRYE. In committee meeting.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does the gentleman say that a majority of the Committee on Rules——

Mr. FRYE. I stated exactly what took place; and the gentleman from Kentucky understands it perfectly well.

Mr. BLACKBURN. And the "gentleman from Kentucky" will understand it better.

Mr. FRYE. How will he understand it better?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does the gentleman from Maine say that any meeting of the Committee on Rules was ever had where this resolution was considered with a majority of that committee present?

Mr. FRYE. The gentleman from Kentucky understood what I said; did he not?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I understood the gentleman from Maine to say "no."

Mr. FRYE. I did not say "no."

Mr. BLACKBURN. Well, I say "no."

Mr. FRYE. Was the gentleman there?

Mr. BLACKBURN. No; but I have the word of the gentleman from Maine for it.

Mr. FRYE. The gentleman from Kentucky speaks entirely without knowledge.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I speak upon the authority of the gentleman from Maine himself.

Mr. FRYE. The gentleman does not speak upon my authority.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It has not been ten minutes since the statement was given to me by you.

Mr. FRYE. I stated the exact fact: that I was called to a meeting of the Committee on Rules; the gentleman from Kentucky was not there.

Mr. BLACKBURN. And was not called there.

Mr. FRYE. There were only two gentlemen there. This rule was passed upon and agreed to by those two, with the understanding that it should be submitted to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] and the gentleman from Kentucky, and, if a majority were in favor of it, should be reported to the House. I stated that distinctly; and then I said that I could not find the gentleman. Now, why should he charge upon me—by implication, at any rate—that I have not stated what is the fact?

Mr. BLACKBURN. So far from charging it by implication, I never deal in implications. I deal in direct assertions.

Mr. FRYE. What is your direct assertion?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I stated to this House that it was not my purpose to reflect upon the gentleman in any wise for the report of this resolution; but I also stated the fact that I had never been present at any meeting of the Committee on Rules when this resolution was considered, and never had been called to such a meeting, and never had seen the resolution, though in my place every day and every hour. That is what I said.

Mr. FRYE. Now suppose that should turn out to be true——

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does the gentleman question it?

Mr. FRYE. I am going on with the supposition.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does the gentleman question the truth of my statement?

Mr. FRYE. Allow me to finish my remark.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentleman answer my question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky will not interrupt the gentleman from Maine except with his consent.

Mr. FRYE. Suppose it to be the fact that the gentleman was not there. I know he was not there, and I have said so, have I not? Suppose the gentleman was absent at a meeting of the Committee on Rules, does it follow that the committee can do nothing absolutely?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes, if there is not a quorum present.

Mr. FRYE. Well, when a quorum has agreed to a resolution, does the absence of the gentleman from Kentucky spoil it?

Mr. BLACKBURN. That quorum was not there, according to the gentleman's own statement.

Mr. FRYE. A quorum of the committee has agreed to the resolution; and I take it that, being presented properly to the House, it is within the power of the House to enact it into a rule.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The question is whether it is properly presented. There never was a quorum there.

The SPEAKER. What action does the gentleman from Maine propose?

Mr. FRYE. I now yield ten minutes, according to promise, to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. YOUNG.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. Now, I raise the point of order before the gentleman from Tennessee proceeds——

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Yes; I would like to have this question settled.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That this report is not properly before the House for its consideration. I raise it on the statement of the gentleman from Maine.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is made too late. When the report was presented it might have been in order, but it was not questioned. The meeting at which it was to be considered was an adjourned meeting. There was not a quorum present. The gentleman is correct in his statement, there were but two members present, the Chair and the gentleman from Maine. The gentleman from Maine had prepared this resolution and submitted it to the present occupant of the chair. It was then agreed it should be submitted to the other members. The Chair does not know why it was not submitted to the gentleman from Kentucky; but the point of order the gentleman now makes comes, in the opinion of the Chair, too late. It made it ought to have been made at the time when the report was submitted.

Mr. BLOUNT. How could it have been made when it was not known?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I make another point. It was represented by the gentleman from Maine that this is a report from the committee, and it now appears it was not a report from the committee.

Mr. FRYE. What does the gentleman from Illinois mean? It was a report of the committee, and I have so stated to this House. If a majority of a committee agree to a report is not that the report of the committee?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I say that the gentleman has announced to the House that but two members of the committee were present when it was considered, and yet there are five members of that committee who ought to have been summoned to attend its meeting.

Mr. FRYE. I have announced to the House that it was presented to a majority of the members of that committee and that they have agreed to it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The point I make is this, and I adhere to it, that the gentleman from Maine, as I understood him, represented this to be the report of the Committee on Rules. I maintain he could only be warranted in making that statement on leave given by a majority of that committee when legally in session as a committee. Now he confesses on the floor that he had only the consent of two members of that committee to make the report.

Mr. FRYE. I did not confess anything of the kind and the gentleman must be dull to understand so.

Mr. CALKINS. I demand the regular order.

Mr. FRYE. I demand the previous question in order to dispose of this matter.

Mr. WARNER. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. My point of order has not yet been decided.

The SPEAKER. It is in substance the same point made by the gentleman from Kentucky which has already been decided.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The difference is this——

Mr. McLANE. Is a motion to recommit it now in order?

The SPEAKER. It is before or after the previous question is ordered.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I submitted that motion long ago, to commit with instructions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not recognize it then because the gentleman had not then the floor to make it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move to recommit with instructions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asked the gentleman from Maine whether he would yield the floor to make that motion and the gentleman from Maine did not yield for that purpose.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move now to recommit with instructions to the Committee on Rules to report day after to-morrow after the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland now makes a motion to recommit and the gentleman from Kentucky moves to amend by adding "with instructions," as stated by him.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say a word about this matter.

Mr. FRYE. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WARNER. I wish to have my point of order ruled upon. I claimed the floor and was recognized and was taken off it without my consent. Manifestly by this ruling a majority of the members of the committee—three-fifths—will be ruled out of any privilege under the rules.

The SPEAKER. That is as to the effect of the resolution, and is not a point of order.

Mr. WARNER. I say privileges cannot be extended to this number of members in that way.

Mr. McLANE. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the motion to commit with instructions.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say for myself as a member of the Committee on Rules, that when this appeal was made to support it the Speaker, the gentleman from Maine, and myself, three members, a majority of that committee, according to my recollection, were together in the corridor where we came to consider it.

The SPEAKER. There was a meeting at the room of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] a member of the Committee on Rules, and the Chair understood there was to be an adjourned meeting of the committee on Tuesday morning following, when this matter was to be considered. The gentleman from Kentucky states that he did not so understand. The Chair has directed his attention to that fact and he said he did not have notice.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The Chair will do me the justice to add that understanding there was to be an adjourned meeting on Tuesday and not knowing at what hour or what place, I sent the clerk of my committee to the Speaker to ascertain the time and place of holding it, and I received no answer and never heard aught of the meeting on Tuesday, nor of any action taken.

The SPEAKER. The recollection of the Chair is, and it differs from that of the gentleman from Kentucky, that it was at the meeting in the room of the gentleman from Georgia when an adjourned meeting was provided for.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The Speaker will bear witness that a majority of the Committee on Rules evidently did not seem to have so remembered, for the reason that a majority did not attend that meeting.

The SPEAKER. That is the recollection of the Chair at all events.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I know that. But it does not seem to have been so understood by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. GOODE. Would it be in order to lay this whole subject on the table?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain and submit the motion.

Mr. GOODE. I move to lay it on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, that the subject be recommitted to the Committee on Rules with instructions.

Mr. McLANE. My motion was, without instructions.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Kentucky is submitted as first in order under the rules.

Several MEMBERS. What is the pending question?

The SPEAKER. The pending question is the motion to recommit to the committee, with instructions to report in two days.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 78, noes 121.

Mr. BLACKBURN demanded tellers.

Before the result of the demand for tellers was announced,

Mr. COFFROTH demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The SPEAKER. Thirty-seven members having voted on the demand for tellers, being a sufficient number, tellers are ordered. The Chair appoints Mr. BLACKBURN and Mr. FRYE.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 68, noes 118.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. McLANE. Does not the question now recur on the motion which I made, to commit without instructions?

The SPEAKER. Under the rule there can be but one motion to commit pending a demand for the previous question, either with or without instructions.

Mr. FRYE. I ask consent to modify the resolution by inserting the words "and on the Speaker's table" after the word "calendars;" so that the bills to be called up shall be on the calendars and such bills as are on the Speaker's table.

There was no objection to the proposed modification.

Mr. FRYE. I now demand the previous question on the proposition.

Mr. McLANE. May I ask a parliamentary question? What has become of the motion to commit without instructions?

The SPEAKER. That has been voted down.

Mr. McLANE. I did not understand that vote to be upon my motion.

The SPEAKER. Pending the demand for the previous question but one motion to commit with or without instructions is in order. The Chair will cause the rule to be read, Rule XVII:

The Clerk read as follows:

1. There shall be a motion for the previous question, which, being ordered by a majority of members present, if a quorum, shall have the effect to cut off all debate and bring the House to a direct vote upon the immediate question or questions on which it has been asked and ordered. The previous question may be asked and ordered upon a single motion, a series of motions allowable under the rules, or an amendment or amendments, or may be made to embrace all authorized motions or amendments, and include the bill to its engrossment and third reading, and then, on renewal and second of said motion, to its passage or rejection. It shall be in order, pending the motion for or after the previous question shall have been ordered on its passage, for the Speaker to entertain and submit a motion to commit, with or without instructions, to a standing or select committee; and a motion to lay upon the table shall be in order on the second and third reading of a bill.

Mr. BELFORD. I wish to ask a parliamentary question. I would like to know if the House refuses to order the previous question would this proposition be open for further amendment?

The SPEAKER. It will be open both for amendment and debate.

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to ask before I vote upon this proposition, what is the practical effect of it? I wish to know, if the proposition is adopted, whether it will accomplish anything. The State of Alabama, for instance, is called by the Speaker, and one member is recognized to report a bill which is not opposed by five members; that bill, of course, comes before the House for consideration, and five minutes probably is consumed in discussing it. But suppose there is a considerable minority who do not desire to pass that bill; what I would like to know is, can that minority, by dilatory motions or in some other way, take up the time of the House and so defeat the consideration of the proposition presented in that way?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be bound to recognize all motions under the rule, whatever might be the effect of them. Their tendency might be to delay, or they might be classed under the head of dilatory motions; but if coming within the scope of the rules the Chair would have no option but to recognize them.

Mr. AIKEN. Then, under that condition, if this rule is adopted, the State of Alabama could consume the entire morning hour running through the whole session.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on ordering the main question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 160, noes 32.

So the main question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. SPRINGER. The amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] has not been submitted.

Mr. FRYE. Unanimous consent was asked for that amendment, and no objection being made, the resolution has been modified as I asked.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will now be read as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, After to-day, on each day of the remainder of the session other than the third Monday of February and the last six days, whenever on motion the morning hour shall be dispensed with by a two-thirds vote, that hour shall be set apart for the consideration of bills on the several calendars and on the Speaker's table under the following regulations: The States and Territories shall be called in order as now provided for, and as each is called, one of its members shall be named by the Speaker, selected in alphabetical order, who may move the consideration of a bill; if objected to by five members rising in their seats it shall not be considered, otherwise the member making the motion shall be entitled to five minutes for explanation of his bill, or, instead thereof, to the reading of the report accompanying the same, provided the reading of such report shall not exceed five minutes, and then a vote shall be taken. The call of States shall go on from day to day until completed, as above provided, and whenever all the Members and Delegates from any State or Territory have been named by the Speaker, such State or Territory shall thereafter be omitted from the call until all the Members and Delegates shall have been so named. Any member not answering as his name is called shall be considered to have waived his privilege.

Mr. SIMONTON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, thirty-six members voting therefor, more than one-fifth of the last vote.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 147, nays 79, not voting 66; as follows:

Mr. STONE with Mr. MONEY, for this day.

Mr. FRYE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHIEF OF OFFICIAL REPORTERS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to announce that under authority given to the Speaker by Rule XXXVI and in pursuance of the opinion of the Committee on Rules unanimously expressed in writing that there should be a chief of the corps of official reporters of this House, the Chair has appointed Mr. John J. McElhone as such chief. The Chair has made this selection because the gentleman named has been longest in service on the corps.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I move that the House do now adjourn.

ADDITIONAL CLERKS IN SURGEON-GENERAL'S OFFICE.

Pending the motion to adjourn,

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War relative to additional clerks in the Surgeon-General's Office; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LIEUTENANT S. R. DOUGLAS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, relative to the losses sustained by fire by Lieutenant S. R. Douglas; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SURGICAL LIBRARY AND MUSEUM.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, relative to a fire-proof building, surgical library, and museum; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

HEADQUARTERS, PRESCOTT, ARIZONA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, relative to appropriation for headquarters, Prescott, Arizona; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

NEW MILITARY POST IN MONTANA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, relative to an estimate for an appropriation for a new military post to be constructed near the Mussel Shell River in Montana; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

HOLSTON AND CLINCH RIVERS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of examination of Holston and Clinch Rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. DAVIDSON, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of F. Jordan, of Florida, there being no adverse report thereon.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 10, 1881.

The Senate met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ELECTIONS AND APPOINTMENTS IN RHODE ISLAND.

Mr. ANTHONY. I give notice that on next Saturday, if the Senate shall conclude to sit on Saturday, I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate at the close of the morning business to make some remarks upon the reports of the two committees which visited Rhode Island to inquire into the alleged violation of law in that State.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, calling attention to the destruction by fire of the headquarters building, Department of Arizona, located at Prescott, and recommending an appropriation for rebuilding the same; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs recommending that Congress authorize the use of certain moneys belonging to the eastern band of Cherokee Indians, of North Carolina, to enable them to join their brethren in the Indian Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented the petition of John Graham, of College Point, Queens County, New York, praying for the passage of an act conferring on the Court of Claims full authority and jurisdiction to award him a just compensation for the damages and loss sustained by him on account of the detention of his three steamships in the harbor of New York by order of the President of the United States, May 16, 1855; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. VOORHEES. I present a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, and as it is brief I will ask the privilege of the Senate to have it read in full.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Concurrent resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana.

Whereas the Kankakee River in the State of Indiana may be made a navigable stream through the counties of Lake, Newton, Porter, Jasper, La Porte, Starke, and Saint Joseph a distance of eighty miles from the town of Momence, in the State of Illinois; and

Whereas the channel of the said river can be straightened and deepened for an expenditure of $100,000: Therefore,

Resolved by the senate, (the house concurring,) That the Senators and Representatives of the State of Indiana now in the Congress of the United States are hereby requested to vote for an appropriation by the General Government of $100,000 to be applied in deepening, widening, and straightening, wherever necessary, the Kankakee River in the State of Indiana, and to use their best efforts to procure passage of the same.

Resolved, That the secretary of the senate be, and is hereby, instructed to furnish each member of Congress from this State a copy of the concurrent resolution of the General Assembly asking an appropriation of $100,000 by the General Government for the improvement of the Kankakee River, and the proceedings of the two houses thereon.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move that the resolution be printed and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN. I present the memorial of a large number of the most intelligent citizens of the city of Savannah, and the counties of Chatham and Bryan, State of Georgia, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of the inland channel through Romney marsh on the coast of Georgia, adopting the channel which would connect the city of Savannah by the boat line with Warsaw Island. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia, presented a resolution of the city council of Savannah, Georgia, indorsing the establishment of a national maritime quarantine station on Black Beard Island, and favoring an appropriation for the erection of suitable buildings and complete equipment of the same at that place; which was referred to the Select Committee to investigate and report the best means of preventing the introduction and spread of Epidemic Diseases.

Mr. WALLACE presented resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, in favor of an appropriation of $40,000 for the erection of two ice-breakers in the Ohio River; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

HEIRS OF COLORED SOLDIERS.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I present the petition of George C. Smith, A. I. Rhodes, and others, praying favorable action on House bill No. 5562, entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs of colored soldiers." The legislation relative to bounty and pensions of colored soldiers has been construed by the officers executing the laws so as to discriminate against such persons of this class who were slaves in April, 1861. To relieve claimants of the disabilities under which this legislation left them, the act of March 3, 1873, was passed, entitled "An act to place colored persons who enlisted in the Army on the same footing as other soldiers as to bounty and pensions."

This act was construed by the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, February 13, 1879, so as still to disallow claims of a certain class.

The bill now before the Senate committee proposes to construe the act of 1873 so as to remove all disabilities relative to the heirs of colored soldiers.

As explanatory of the grounds upon which this legislation is asked, I beg also to submit the following official communication of the Second Auditor of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, SECOND AUDITOR'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 18, 1881.

SIR: In reply to your verbal inquiry of the 15th instant, as to the status of the heirs of colored soldiers under the act of March 3, 1873, I have to state:

First. In case of colored soldiers shown by record to have been free April 19, 1861, all bounty has been allowed just the same as in case of white soldiers.

Second. The additional bounty, act of July 28, 1866, and the bounty, act of July 4, 1864, have been allowed in case of colored soldiers, whether slave or free, in the same manner as in the case of white soldiers.

Third. Prior to the act of March 3, 1873, the bounties under act of July 22, 1861, and joint resolution of January 13, 1864, were not allowed in case of colored soldiers who were slaves April 19, 1861.

Fourth. The act of March 3, 1873, was construed by the accounting officers as applicable to discharged living soldiers, not to heirs; but after the decision of the Attorney-General of March 26, 1878, all bounty in case of colored soldiers, slave or free, living or deceased, was until February 13, 1879, allowed by this office in the same manner as in the case of white soldiers.

Fifth. Claims in case of heirs of deceased colored soldiers shown to be slaves April 19, 1861, which were filed and settled prior to the Attorney-General's decision of March 26, 1878, were, under this decision, until February 13, 1879, reopened and considered when such cases were properly referred to, either by the claimants or by their duly authorized attorneys.

Claims of this character filed and disallowed prior to March 26, 1878, were and are now considered under the Attorney-General's decision of said date, when such claims supported by proper evidence are referred to either by claimants or by their authorized attorneys.

Again, claims of this character filed prior to March 26, 1878, that have not been either settled or disallowed, but are now pending as original claims, are considered under the Attorney-General's decision of said date.

Sixth. All original claims in case of colored soldiers, (in behalf of whom or whose heirs no settlement has ever been made by this office,) whenever filed, are now considered, as far as bounty is concerned, on the same footing as claims in case of white soldiers.

Seventh. Therefore, the only claims in case of colored soldiers that are affected by the decision of the honorable Secretary of the Treasury of February 13, 1879, are the claims filed as additional to those that were settled subsequent to the act of March 3, 1873, for all due under laws and decisions then in force; and the additional claims are disallowed on the ground that according to the said decision of the honorable Secretary of the Treasury such cases should not be reopened.

Very respectfully,

O. FERRISS, Auditor.

Hon. B. K. BRUCE, United States Senate.

While I have the ear of the Chair I beg to call the attention of the Committee on Military Affairs to the importance of action in this matter. The persons to be benefited by this bill are a necessitous class, a class who have exhibited some patience while waiting for an adjustment of their claims.

I move that the petition with the accompanying communication be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SAUNDERS, from the Committee on Railroads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 2041) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Omaha, in the State of Nebraska, and to establish the same as a post-road, reported it with amendments.

Mr. BOOTH, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the petition of John L. Mason, of New York, asking for an extension of his patents for a screw-top glass jar known as the Mason fruit-jar, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. VOORHEES, from the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4451) to provide for the erection of a monument at Schuylerville, New York, commemorative of the battle of Saratoga, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

CUSTOMS DISTRICT IN MAINE.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6451) to amend and re-enact sections 2517 and 2518 of the Revised Statutes, and changing the boundaries of a customs district in the State of Maine, to report it back without amendment, and with a recommendation that it pass.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am unable often to be present in the Senate. That bill simply changes the boundaries of the collection district in which I live. There is no objection in the world to it, and I ask the Senate to consider it now.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HALL OF RECORDS.

Mr. VEST. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to propose an amendment to the bill (S. No. 1889) making appropriation for the purchase of ground and the erection thereon, in the city of Washington, of a building to be used as a hall of records, and to ask for the present consideration of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It appropriates $200,000 for the purchase of a site near the War Department, and erection thereon of a brick and metal fire-proof building, to be used for the safe-keeping of records of the Executive Departments not required in the present executive offices for constant reference, as recommended by the Secretary of War in his annual reports of 1879 and 1880.

Mr. VEST. The amendment which I have been directed to offer is to add to the bill:

Said building to be erected according to plans prepared by the Quartermaster-General and heretofore submitted, and under his supervision and direction.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. VEST. I am directed by the committee to make a brief statement of facts in order to call the attention of the Senate to the importance of the speedy passage of this bill. Day before yesterday a fire occurred in the old Navy Department building which imperiled the records of the Government, in regard to which I have a communication from the Quartermaster-General which I shall ask to be read, the loss of which would entail upon us endless and harassing litigation in the Departments. All the pension records, together with a vast amount of other records which could not be replaced under any state of the case, which would open the door to any amount of fraud, were imperiled by this fire, and this is the third time that this thing has happened within less than three years. Upon the occurrence of the fire preceding this the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds took action and introduced this bill at the beginning of this session; it has lain here ever since without any action, and the committee are unwilling to assume any further responsibility, but choose to place this matter before the Senate. I ask that the communication from the Quartermaster-General be now read. It states the facts in regard to the necessity for the passage of the bill.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 8, 1881.

DEAR SIR: I learned just now from Mr. Crosby, chief clerk of the War Department, that there was a fire to-day in that part of the War Office located in the old Navy Department building; usual cause, timber about fireplace charred, finally took fire. It was happily extinguished without much damage.

This led to his speaking of the records of discontinued commands, a part of the Adjutant-General's records, which fill a building eighty feet by over twenty feet and five stories high, all of which, like the records of the Quartermaster's Department, would go off in a flash if once fairly on fire.

This is the third fire remembered in the War Department.

I hope this Congress will give appropriation for a fire-proof hall of records.

The danger to records of this office is a constant anxiety to me. These and those of the Adjutant-General are essential to doing justice to soldiers seeking payment of money or pensions due them under the laws of Congress, and to protecting the United States against claims of many sorts growing out of the history and operations of the Army.

If the bill, Senate No. 1889, Forty-sixth Congress, third session, providing for hall of records cannot be got up, perhaps it can be passed as an amendment to the sundry civil bill. It is purely a United States executive matter, not for the District of Columbia.

The appropriation has had the recommendation of the Secretary of War and of the President repeatedly.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. C. MEIGS,
Quartermaster-General, Bvt. Maj. Gen'l, U. S. A.

Hon. JUSTIN S. MORRILL, United States Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds by the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. COCKRELL asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2170) granting a pension to Emma A. Porch; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WINDOM asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2172) regulating the pension of William Blaisdell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PENDLETON asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 155) to exempt certain wild animals from duty when imported by zoological societies; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

EXAMINATION OF PENSION CLAIMS.

Mr. BLAIR asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2171) providing for the temporary increase of facilities for the examination and adjudication of pension claims; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask that the bill be printed and lie on the table. I wish to say in this connection that it now having become quite apparent that there is not likely to be any legislation for the relief of applicants for pensions by way of attachment to the general appropriation bills, I think that those who realize fully the extent of the evils that grow out of the delays in affording facilities for the proper prosecution of pension claims ought to antagonize appropriation bills and any other legislation whatever until an enactment can be secured from the present Congress to relieve the distress that exists in the land from this cause. I give notice that if Senate bill No. 496, in charge of the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, can be called to the attention of the Senate, I shall move to substitute the provisions of this bill as an amendment to the same; and if the matter cannot be reached in that way I trust the Senate will be disposed to hold night sessions if necessary in order that this subject may receive proper attention. It was well suggested a few days ago by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] that neglect to legislate on this subject would of itself be one of the strongest possible reasons for the holding of an extra session of the incoming Congress. I certainly think so myself. The amount of distress and suffering and wrong to be inflicted upon the worthiest class of supporters of the Government by our cruel negligence to relieve them is already sufficiently apparent from the debates which have taken place in this body, and it cannot be exaggerated. If I may do so without an intrusion upon individual members of the Senate, I ask that when this bill is printed Senators will be so kind as to examine its provisions, and I think it will be found to obviate very many of the difficulties which have been developed in the course of the debate as existing in the minds of Senators.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be printed and lie on the table subject to the call of the Senator from New Hampshire.

V. S. M. CHAPMAN.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. A short time ago I reported adversely from the Committee on Claims the bill (S. No. 1158) for the relief of V. S. M. Chapman, and it was indefinitely postponed. The junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] desires that the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed be reconsidered and the bill placed upon the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered if there be no objection. The Chair hears none, and the bill will be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

DISTRICT MUNICIPAL CODE.

Mr. WITHERS. If the morning business proper has been completed, I ask, in pursuance of the notice given yesterday, that unanimous consent be given that we proceed to the consideration of the pension bills upon the Calendar which have been favorably reported, in order that the Calendar may be relieved of those cases.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will first inquire, Is there further business for the morning hour? The Chair will recognize the Senator from Virginia when the morning business is concluded.

Mr. HARRIS. I call up the resolution that I reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia, some days since, providing for night sessions. I ask for a vote upon it this morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee calls for the consideration, in the morning hour, of the resolution standing upon the Calendar reported by him. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. HARRIS February 8, as amended, as follows:

Resolved, That on and after Wednesday the 9th of February, 1881, the Senate will take a recess at —— o'clock p. m., and meet at seven and a half o'clock p. m., for the purpose of considering House bill No. 5541, entitled "An act to establish a municipal code for the District of Columbia," and will continue so to meet each day until the same shall have been finally acted upon by the Senate.

Mr. WHYTE. The day named in the resolution having passed, I move to insert in lieu of the date named "Monday, the 14th of February;" so as to read "that on and after Monday, the 14th of February, 1881," &c.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection so far as I am personally concerned to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland. The resolution was reported by me from the Committee on the District of Columbia, and I do not know that I have the right to accept the amendment, but I have no objection to it.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I have a word to say in regard to the bill which is the subject of the resolution. I would be very glad to have the people of this District have their code, but they have the law already substantially I suppose as it will be codified if this bill should pass, and can get along for twelve months longer perhaps without much inconvenience. There is a bill on the Calendar from a special committee in regard to contagious diseases of cattle that in my judgment is second in importance to no bill, not even the funding bill, pending before this body, and I will not consent for one that the District code bill shall take its place in our order of business that may possibly defeat the consideration of the bill to prevent the spread of contagious diseases among cattle. Your funding bill will not amount to much, perhaps, at least not as much as it ought to, if those diseases spread beyond the Alleghany Mountains; and we are derelict in our duty, I think, if we do not do something to prevent so great a public misfortune. As a matter of interest to the public, this code has no comparative importance at all, and I hope the Senator from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSTON] who has charge of the other bill to which I have referred will insist upon it with me that nothing shall be done that may possibly defeat the consideration of the bill to which I have alluded.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I agree with the Senator from Iowa as to the importance of the bill he has mentioned. I should have called it up before this time but for the fact that appropriation bills have occupied the attention of the Senate and I did not desire to antagonize them; but I shall antagonize any other bills except appropriation bills. Whenever the Post-Office appropriation bill is concluded, I shall ask the Senate to take up and consider the bill referred to by the Senator from Iowa, and I shall antagonize it to any other bill. I do not consider any bill before this Senate or before the House more important than that, and therefore I shall call it up whenever the pending appropriation bill is through.

Mr. BAYARD. I offered an amendment at the time the resolution was under discussion last to substitute the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt. That amendment I believe is before the Senate.

I desire also to say that I think it would not be wise on the part of the Senate to attempt to consider even the funding bill in night sessions. It is a bill that demands very thoughtful consideration on the part of each Senator before he shall cast his vote upon it. I think it would be impracticable, experience has proven it to be impracticable, to keep a quorum of the Senate in night sessions after Senators have been engaged all day in committee and in legislative business. For that reason I should not, if I had control of the funding bill, desire it to be brought up irregularly and at night sessions; but if the time of the Senate between now and the 4th of March is to be occupied by night sessions, then I feel it my duty to press the consideration of the funding bill upon the attention of the Senate to the exclusion of every other bill except those for the essential appropriations to carry on the Government.

I therefore hope that the amendment which I have offered to substitute the funding bill instead of the bill reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia and suggested by the Senator from Tennessee will prevail, and I hope then the Senate will not attempt to hold night sessions at this time.

Mr. CONKLING. Impressed by the importance of the bill referred to by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KIRKWOOD] and glad as I should be to join him in advancing that bill, I rise more especially to say a word about the bill touching the District of Columbia. The Senate will remember that the senior Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] not now in his place, only a day or two ago indicated his interest in the District bill and the fact that he had given attention to it. I call attention to this more especially to address it to the Senator from Tennessee, thinking perhaps that he might be willing to consider this resolution when the Senator from Ohio is here, as he happens now to be absent. For myself, I hope this District bill will not be considered in a night session. I agree with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] in the well-nigh impossibility of inducing a quorum of Senators to remain here for any business in the evening after beginning, as most of them do, at ten or eleven o'clock with committees and having been engaged all day. The funding bill, however, will no doubt command a general, if not full, attendance of the Senate. If the District of Columbia bill commands the attendance of a quorum, it will be only because a quorum is kept for formal purposes; it will never command the attention of a majority of the Senate at evening sessions.

Inasmuch as we have been told that nearly all the provisions of the bill are operative now by virtue of ordinances, regulations, and otherwise, it cannot be said that there is any very great urgency in respect of it; and I submit for that reason that the Senator from Tennessee ought not to press this resolution. What harm can come if the bill relating to the code goes over until another session? This is the short session; it has a positive and certain termination; and there are a great many things of importance to be done. If this code is to be passed, it has to go through haphazard and in a lump, whether it be by day or by night, and certainly so if it is to be done at night sessions where nothing else is to be considered and where every Senator unless he has some special interest in this, knowing that nothing else is to be acted upon, will feel or think he feels at liberty to attend to some one of the other many pressing things which make demands upon all hours now.

Therefore, although I am very sorry to vote against the Senator from Tennessee and will always vote for his convenience or the convenience of his committee in considering business, I cannot vote to select this local bill and deposit that in evening sessions to take the chance which I know there awaits it. I say to the Senator from Tennessee, no matter how meritorious it is, let it go over, if need be, to a long session and let it be taken up before the crowded hours of that session are reached and let us give to it some part of the attention which I think the District deserves and so little of which I think it receives. I do not mean that the Committee on the District of Columbia do not give such attention, but I speak of myself and other Senators at large when I say that we do not give to the interests of this District the attention which I believe they demand.

Now I wish the Senator from Tennessee would let this resolution lie over until the Senator from Ohio comes in, and even then I shall join with others in urging him not to put this District code into evening sessions but give it at least the opportunity that it may have by day.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, there are at least two reasons why it is very important, if it be convenient to the Senate, to consider and dispose of this bill at an early day. Unless it can be disposed of in the Senate at a very early day it cannot be enrolled, the bill being three hundred and thirty-odd pages. It has cost months of hard labor in the other end of the Capitol as well as some months of labor in this end to perfect it so far as it has been perfected, and while all that may be thrown aside and the District wait a year longer for the codification of its municipal laws, there is yet a more important reason. Our laws as they now exist for the collection of the revenues of the District are very defective, and one of the results of that condition of the law is found in the fact that there is nearly a million of dollars of taxes in arrear. We need remedies that the law does not now furnish for the collection of the District revenue, and it is important that they should be furnished at as early a day as in the convenience of the two Houses of Congress it can be furnished, and all that I ask, Mr. President, is that the Senate shall determine by its vote as to whether it will consider or will not consider this bill and direct as to the importance or relative importance of the various measures that are pending, and proceed to the consideration of something without wasting further time in debating what we shall consider.

Mr. BAYARD. I move that the further consideration of this resolution be postponed until Monday next.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Delaware moves that the further consideration of this resolution be postponed until Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUR OF DAILY MEETING.

Mr. INGALLS. I move the adoption of the following order:

Ordered, That on and after Monday next the daily hour of meeting shall be eleven o'clock a. m.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let that go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule.

DEBATE ON MOTIONS TO TAKE UP.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That on a motion to take up a bill or resolution for consideration at the present or at a future time debate shall be limited to fifteen minutes, and no Senator shall speak to such motion oftener than once, or for a longer time than five minutes.

Mr. INGALLS. Let that go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule.

AMENDMENT TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 7036) to establish post-routes; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. WITHERS. The morning business being over, I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of pension bills on the Calendar with favorable reports.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia asks the Senate to consider at this time pension bills upon the Calendar favorably reported from the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WHYTE. I hope the Senator from Virginia will not limit it to favorable reports.

Mr. HILL, of Colorado. I demand the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is the consideration of the Calendar of General Orders under the special order of the day.

Mr. WITHERS. I renew my motion, then, that the regular order be postponed until to-morrow morning for the purpose of proceeding at once to the consideration of bills on the Calendar with favorable reports from the Committee on Pensions.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia moves to postpone the pending order, being the consideration of the Calendar of General Orders.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia now moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the calendar of pension bills reported favorably.

Mr. WHYTE. I move to strike out the words "reported favorably," and let the motion apply to all pension cases as reported from the committeee, whether adversely or favorably. There are only a few adverse reports, and they might as well be disposed of.

Mr. WITHERS. There are about twenty of them, and any one of them will give rise to debate that will consume the whole morning hour.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the Senator from Virginia move to take up the first pension bill, and when that is disposed of the second, and so on. He need not have any order made about it.

Mr. WITHERS. Very well; I withdraw my motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion is withdrawn.

ANGUS M'AULEY.

Mr. WITHERS. Now, following the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 1432.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 1432) granting a pension to Angus McAuley. It proposes to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Angus McAuley, of Suwannee County, Florida, a soldier of the war of 1812, and to pay him his pension from the time when he was dropped from the rolls.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments.

The first amendment of the Committee on Pensions was, in line 4, to strike out "place on" and insert "restore to;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-roll, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 7, before "war," to insert "Creek Indian," and after "war," in the same line, to strike out "eighteen hundred and twelve, and pay him his pension from the time when he was dropped from the rolls" and insert "and pay him a pension from and after the passage of this act;" so as to make the clause read:

The name of Angus McAuley, of Suwannee County, Florida, a soldier of the Creek Indian war, and pay him a pension from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. CALL. I hope the Senate will not concur in that amendment of the committee. The facts of the case are these: This man was a pensioner on the roll at the time of the commencement of the late civil war; he was disabled by age and disease and by wounds incurred in the service. He was never in any wise whatever disloyal or concerned in the war or connected with it in any shape or form. I submit to the Senate that there is nothing in the laws of the United States which deprive a pensioner, loyal to the Government throughout the whole war, of his right to a pension. By reason of his residence within the confederate lines during the war he was disabled from drawing his pension and was stricken from the roll. There is not a particle of evidence that he comes within any of the provisions of the statute of the United States which prescribes disloyalty as the condition of forfeiting a pension.

For these reasons I ask of the Senate that they shall not concur in the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. WITHERS. I wish to state briefly in reply that the amendment of the committee was incorporated into the bill because of the provisions of the act of 1878 or 1879—1878, I believe—when pensioners who had been thus dropped were restored to the rolls, and the act which restores them to the rolls contains a provision that they should receive pension only from the date of the restoration. The committee put this case on the footing of all other cases where pensioners are restored to the rolls by the operation of that law.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the report be read in this case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HOAR in the chair.) The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. INGALLS April 30, 1880:

The Committee on Pensions submit the following report:

Angus McAuley was a soldier in the Seminole and Creek Indian war, and was pensioned at $2 per month from February 7, 1859. He was dropped from the rolls by reason of his residence within the limits of the insurrectionary States. He asks that he may be restored, and files evidence that he did not perform military service in the confederate army. The committee recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendments: In line 4 strike out the words "place on" and insert "restore to;" in line 7, before "war," insert the words "Creek Indian;" strike out all after the word "war," in line 7, and insert "and pay him a pension from and after the passage of this act."

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, although I am not now a member of the Committee on Pensions, as I made the report that has just been read, the case having been referred to me as a sub-committee, I will briefly state the grounds upon which the committee acted.

Mr. McAuley was a soldier of the war of 1812 who was dropped from the roll under the provisions of the statute by reason of his residence within the insurrectionary States. He could have obtained a restoration to the roll by applying to the Commissioner of Pensions, if he had seen fit to do so and could take the oath required by law that he had not while he was so dropped engaged in the rebellion or actively sympathized therewith. He refused to take that oath; he refused to make the application to the bureau for reasons that were satisfactory, I have no doubt, to himself; but having failed to apply to the officer of the Government who under the law had the right to restore him, the committee felt, and I still feel, that if he applies to Congress for relief he should only obtain such relief as is awarded to all those who are within the class to which he belongs. If he wants arrears, or desires to be paid during the period for which he was dropped, the law points out how he can obtain that. If he does not see fit to avail himself of that but comes to Congress for relief, the relief that we grant should be from the passage of the act, the same as all others are treated.

Upon those grounds I hope that the Senate will sustain the report of the committee, and allow this man a pension only from the time when the bill passes.

Mr. CONKLING. Before the Senator from Kansas sits down, I wish to ask him a question if he will allow me. What is there in this case to distinguish it from other cases of like kind?

Mr. INGALLS. Nothing that I know of.

Mr. CONKLING. Am I to infer, then, that if all the pensioners who because of taking part in the rebellion were dropped from the rolls, come to Congress asking restoration, within the precedent of this case, they should be restored?

Mr. INGALLS. I can see no reason why, if all those who were dropped come to Congress for relief if this act passes, they cannot treat it as a precedent under which they would be entitled to claim arrears during the period for which they were dropped under the operation of the statute.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, that makes this bill rather a large one, and this report for so brief a one comes to mean a great deal.

Mr. WITHERS. There is a provision of law which passed here three or four years ago which restores to the roll those who had been dropped.

Mr. INGALLS. But this man declined to bring himself within the provisions of that statute; he preferred to come to Congress for relief.

Mr. CALL. The Senator from Kansas will pardon me for saying that the proper expression would be that he omitted to do so. He did not decline. There is no evidence that he declined or refused to do it. He simply failed or omitted to do it, either by negligence or otherwise. While I am on the floor I will say to the Senator from New York that the evidence in this case clearly established the fact that this man was a loyal man.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I would like in the briefest time to understand and to have other Senators understand this bill. I am disposed to think that I ascribe some unreal importance to it, and I beg the Senator from Kansas to correct my impression if I do.

Under the acts of Congress, in a word, not following the language, those who participated in the rebellion fell from the pension-rolls. They did so because of an act which described residents of insurrectionary States; but there was a saving provision in that act; namely those who dissented from the movement which had ingulfed those States, upon saying so on oath, regained or retained their place on the pension-rolls. This pensioner having thus been dropped omitted or refused to do so; I make no contest with the honorable Senator from Florida between these words; I do not conceive them to be at all important. Upon coming into the Senate after my credentials have been presented, I may take the oath of office and become a Senator; and if I do not do so, the distinction between that omission and a refusal to do so becomes somewhat shadowy. This pensioner either omitted knowingly—because the law imputes knowledge to every man, and it is one of the maxims of the law that no man is excused because of ignorance of the law—or refused to do the required thing. What was that? To say on his oath that he did not actively participate in or sympathize with the rebellion. Such being the state of case, it is proposed by this bill to import back into the list of pensioners the name of this former pensioner; and the honorable Senator from Kansas with entire candor says that he does not see after this act shall be adopted why it will not as a precedent open the door and establish the right in so far as the action of Congress can establish it in the instance of every man like this man dropped from the pension-rolls, in a word, because he took part against the Government in the recent civil war.

Mr. President, if it is designed to say that all those who thus lost their footing as pensioners are to be put back; that their sins, if sins they were, though they were as scarlet, are to be made white as wool in this regard, I humbly submit that it would be more orderly, more decorous to do it by some general declaration adequate in its terms in this respect, and professing on its face the great measure of, what I trust without offense I may call, magnanimity which it would carry with it, than to take an isolated case in a bill of a half-dozen lines supported by a report of eight or ten lines half of which relates to verbal amendments, and allow from so small an acorn as this so large and spreading an oak to grow.

I do not mean at this time to express, if I have one, an opinion on the propriety and expediency of such a change of the pension laws. The point I speak to is more especially one of method, and I submit to Senators on the one side or on the other who may favor a change of the pension laws that it should be done openly; it should be done expressly; it should be done so that all may see it; and it should not be done by the Senate putting its finger between the belt and the wheel in a single case in order that it may be drawn in entirely in progress of time, there being no particular act and no particular day to which attention can be turned when this somewhat radical revolution of policy is to be effected.

Mr. President, are we proceeding under an order of business according to which an objection carries over a bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOAR in the chair.) The Chair understands from the Chief Clerk that the Calendar has been postponed until to-morrow, and that the present bill was taken up under a vote adopted by the Senate to proceed to its consideration. The Chair supposes, therefore, that it is not liable to objection.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I venture to suggest to the Senator from Virginia, having as I believe charge of this bill, whether it might not be convenient and well to allow it to be passed over in order that the other bills to which no objection will be made may go through, and in order that Senators on either side may form and if they choose express an opinion as to the expediency of this legislation.

Mr. WITHERS. I have no objection individually to the case being passed over; I am merely the representative of the Committee on Pensions. The bill was passed over once before when called up, on the motion of the Senator from Florida, who feels a special interest in it, and who is now opposing the amendment of the committee. I suppose it will be entirely agreeable to him if it be passed over to-day.

Mr. CALL. I have no desire that this bill shall obstruct action on the other pension bills. I scarcely think the honorable Senator from New York will persist in his opposition to this particular case when he finds that it rests upon peculiar ground. This is a case of a man who, by the evidence, has committed no offense. It is not the case of a man who sympathized with the southern or confederate side; it is a man who was loyal to the Government of the United States, and who was so known throughout the country; that was his reputation—an old man unable to render any service, diseased through the whole war, deaf and crippled, and always a Union man, though a resident of the Southern States at the time.

If we admit that by virtue of some supposed conscientious scruple as to swearing, which I do not know to be the case, he declined to swear that he never had any sympathy with those engaged in the confederate cause; if through ignorance of the true import of the oath or the meaning that was attached to it, he omitted or failed or even refused to take the oath, I ask the honorable Senator from New York if it is within the terms of this statute which prescribes disloyalty as the condition of being stricken from the pension-rolls, what reason, I would ask the honorable Senator who has expressed so forcibly his own views on the subject, would there be for depriving a strictly loyal man opposing in opinion the action of his own people and disabled by reason of wounds and disease from moving out of that country, from receiving this little pittance which he was entitled to under the absolute terms of the laws as they now stand and have ever stood? I have no objection to the bill standing over, but I still hope to receive the aid of the Senator from New York, because this applicant has a right, I think, to consideration from him and the other side of this House.

Mr. WITHERS. I move that the bill be passed over without prejudice in order that we may proceed to the consideration of other cases.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia moves that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM HAMILL.

Mr. WITHERS. I now move to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 3788.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 3788) granting an increase of pension to William Hamill. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William Hamill, late sergeant Company E, One hundred and seventeenth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, at the rate of $18 per month.

Mr. INGALLS. The title of that bill would indicate that Hamill was already on the roll; and if that is the case, unless there is some amendment to the bill providing that this pension shall be in lieu of the pension now received by him, he will be entitled to a duplicate pension; I call the attention of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] to that fact in order that the matter may be cleared up to the satisfaction of the Senate.

Mr. WITHERS. The report had better be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. BROWN January 7, 1881:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3788) granting a pension to William Hamill, have examined the same, and report that the evidence satisfies the committee that the applicant received a gunshot wound in his elbow, in battle, that made his arm stiff and caused it to wither, and renders his disability equivalent to the loss of his arm, and therefore the committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hold in my hand the House report in this case, which states that this claimant—was pensioned from January 25, 1865, at $5 per month. This rate was increased to $8 per month from July 18, 1866, and again to $14 from April 2, 1873, and reduced to $10 per month in 1875, on account of the construction of the law hereinafter referred to, by the Pension Office; and the application of the claim for increase of his pension to $18 per month was rejected, because the Commissioner of Pensions holds that, notwithstanding the claimant's disability "is permanent, it is not permanent and specific," and the Commissioner says "a specific disability is one which is specifically described in the law, such as the loss of hands or feet," &c.

Mr. INGALLS. Then the title of the bill is evidently right, and I move to amend——

Mr. COCKRELL. It is to increase the pension.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to amend by adding to the bill the words "which pension shall be in lieu of that now received by him," in order that he may not be twice placed on the roll.

Mr. COCKRELL. The bill says—

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William Hamill, late sergeant Company E, One hundred and seventeenth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, at the rate of $18 per month, from and after the passage of this act.

"In lieu of the pension he is now receiving," it is proposed to add.

Mr. WITHERS. The increase will only date from the passage of the act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas move the amendment he has indicated?

Mr. INGALLS. I do move it.

Mr. WITHERS. I would suggest to the Senator from Kansas that the effect of the amendment will be to send the bill back to the House; and as practically the same result is reached, in my judgment, by the present phraseology of the bill, I hope he will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. The effect of the bill as it now stands without the amendment will be to place him again on the roll. He is there already at $10 a month. This bill provides that Mr. Hamill shall be placed on the rolls at $18 a month, and the construction of these statutes by the Commissioner of Pensions is that they take precedence of assignments under the general law. The amendment plainly ought to be made.

Mr. WITHERS. If the Senator insists on it, I shall not object.

Mr. INGALLS. I certainly will not insist on the amendment as against the wish of the chairman of the committee. If he thinks the bill is sufficient, I will withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. COCKRELL. Do I understand the Senator from Kansas to say that under this bill this pensioner will be placed again upon the pension-roll and receive his $18 and his $10 too that he is already receiving?

Mr. INGALLS. That is my understanding of it.

Mr. COCKRELL. If that is the law, I shall move the amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. But the Senator from Virginia does not agree with me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Missouri to move an amendment?

Mr. COCKRELL. I renew the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is at the end of the bill to add "which pension shall be in lieu of that now received by him."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

DALTON HINCHMAN.

Mr. WITHERS. The next case is House bill No. 1628. I move that it be taken up.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1628) granting a pension to Dalton Hinchman was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing on the pension-roll the name of Dalton Hinchman, late a private in Company G, Second Michigan Cavalry.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM HAZELIT.

Mr. WITHERS. The next is Senate bill No. 2030. I move to take it up.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 2030) granting a pension to William Hazelit was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing on the pension-roll the name of William Hazelit, late a private in Company A, Twelfth Regiment Kansas Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. ELIZABETH UPRIGHT.

Mr. WITHERS. The next is House bill No. 1107. I move to take it up.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1107) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth Upright was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Mrs. Elizabeth Upright, of Rockford, Iowa, who sent eleven sons into the Union Army, and to pay her a pension at the rate per month now allowed to parents for the loss of children upon whom such parents were dependent.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN PATTERSON.

Mr. WITHERS. The next bill I wish taken up is Senate bill No. 1892. I move that it be considered.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 1892) granting a pension to John Patterson was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing on the pension-roll the name of John Patterson, late a corporal in Company B, Third Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry in the war with Mexico.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARTHA NEIL.

Mr. WITHERS. The next is House bill No. 2548. I move to take it up.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 2548) granting a pension to Martha Neil was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing the name of Martha Neil, mother of James Neil, deceased, late a private of Company E, of the One hundred and fourteenth Regiment of Pennsylvania Infantry Volunteers, on the pension-roll.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JACOB GINDER.

Mr. WITHERS. I move to take up House bill No. 3098.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 3098) granting a pension to Jacob Ginder was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Jacob Ginder, father of David H. Ginder, deceased, late a captain, Company I, Eighty-first Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HULDA L. BARNARD.

Mr. WITHERS. I move to take up House bill No. 192.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 192) granting a pension to Hulda L. Barnard was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing on the pension-roll the name of Hulda L. Barnard, widow of Henry B. Barnard, late captain of Company K, Second New York Mounted Rifles, and for paying her a pension from January 10, 1877, at the rate received by her husband in his life-time.

Mr. INGALLS. I see that bill proposes to grant arrears for four years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. DAWES in the chair.) There is an amendment proposed by the committee which has not been read.

Mr. INGALLS. I beg pardon.

The amendment of the Committee on Pensions was, in line 10, to strike out the words "in his life-time" and insert "at the time of his death."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. Does the amendment which has been adopted make the pension commence from the passage of the act?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read as amended.

The CHIEF CLERK. The bill, as amended, reads:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Hulda L. Barnard, widow of Henry B. Barnard, late captain of Company K, Second New York Mounted Rifles, and pay her a pension from January 10, 1877, at the rate received by her husband, Captain Henry B. Barnard, at the time of his death.

Mr. PLATT. That leaves the bill open to the same objection.

Mr. INGALLS. The amendment does not relieve the objection.

Mr. WITHERS. I move to amend by striking out that portion which fixes the pension to commence at the date of the death of the party and substituting "from and after the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KERNAN. As I understand, the committee reported the bill giving her a pension from January, 1877.

Mr. WITHERS. That was the House report, but the Senate committee altered the phraseology.

Mr. KERNAN. Is there not a reason for the bill as fixed by the House?

Mr. WITHERS. None whatever that will override the uniform rule of action of the Senate Committee on Pensions who report arrears of pension on special acts.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

JOHN AMMAHOE.

Mr. WITHERS. I move to take up Senate bill No. 1826.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 1826) granting a pension to Mohammed Kahn, otherwise John Ammahoe. It provides for placing on the pension-roll the name of Mohammed Kahn, otherwise John Ammahoe, late private in Company E, Forty-third Regiment New York Volunteers, his pension to date from his discharge from the service.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, after the word "volunteers," in line 7, to strike out the words "his pension to date from his discharge from said service, and on account of disability incurred in said service."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, the time has arrived for taking up the Post-Office appropriation bill. I ask that it be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will allow the Senator from Virginia to proceed with the pension bills.

Mr. WALLACE. Let the appropriation bill be taken up and then laid aside informally.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a mere form.

Mr. WALLACE. I want the bill laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the bill (H. R. No. 6972) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

Mr. WITHERS. Now I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will yield to me.

Mr. WALLACE. I yield informally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is asked that the appropriation bill be laid aside for the consideration of pension bills. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

ROSALIE LOUIS.

Mr. WITHERS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 4887.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 4887) granting a pension to Rosalie Louis. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Rosalie Louis, widow of Peter Louis, late of Company B, First United States Sharpshooters.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, after the word "sharpshooters," in line 7, to strike out:

Said pension to commence from the date of the death of the soldier, April 21, 1876, and to be for the same sum per month as was received by the deceased soldier at the time of his death.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

JAMES FORSYTH HARRISON.

Mr. WITHERS. I move to take up House bill No. 3487.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 3487) granting a pension to James Forsyth Harrison.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RICHARD P. TAYLOR.

Mr. WITHERS. I move to take up House bill No. 799.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 799) granting a pension to Richard P. Taylor. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Richard P. Taylor, late a private Company E, Thirty-fifth Illinois Infantry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS H. CANFIELD.

Mr. WITHERS. I move next to take up Senate bill No. 1885.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 1885) granting a pension to Thomas H. Canfield. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Thomas H. Canfield, father of Thomas S. Canfield, late corporal of Company C, Thirtieth Regiment of Iowa Volunteer Infantry.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALBERT L. JACK.

Mr. WITHERS. I move to take up House bill No. 2123.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 2123) granting a pension to Albert L. Jack. It provides for placing on the pension-roll the name of Albert N. Jack, late a private in Company B, Eleventh Indiana Cavalry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The Committee on Pensions propose to amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Albert N. Jack."

The amendment was agreed to.

ROBERT S. GOODALL.

Mr. WITHERS. I move next to take up House bill No. 624.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 624) granting a pension to Robert S. Goodall. It proposes to place the name of Robert S. Goodall, late first-class pilot in the United States Navy, in the Mississippi squadron, on the pension-roll, at a rate proportionate to his disability, to be fixed at the Pension Office; the pension to commence at the date of the discharge of Goodall from the service of the United States.

The bill was reported by the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, after the word "pension-rolls," in line 6, to strike out "at a rate proportionate to his disability, to be fixed at the Pension Office; said pension to commence at the date of the discharge of said Goodall from the service of the United States" and to insert in lieu thereof "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

Mr. BECK. I hope the committee will not insist on amending the bill as they have reported to do. I have their report in my hand, which shows absolutely that the man is entirely disabled and that the report made by the assistant surgeon as to the cause of his illness was done through malice. It is clearly shown to have been malicious. Goodall was a good officer, and I think the House bill gives the relief he is entitled to. I ask the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GROOME,] whose report I have in my hand, whether such is not the case. I do not want to take time.

Mr. WITHERS. I wish simply to state that while the weight of evidence is clearly in the direction indicated by the Senator from Kentucky, there are certain depositions in the case which leave it questionable, and the committee did not think it proper to grant him arrears.

Mr. GROOME. I would say a word in reply to the question of the Senator from Kentucky. I agree as a rule with the committee that it is unsafe to give arrears by special act, inasmuch as many of these cases are cases which depend upon equitable principles and in which the Commissioner has clearly decided right under the law, and it is hard for the committee to draw a distinct line between the cases in which pensions are given by special act for the reason that the Commissioner has clearly erred in the opinion of the committee, and cases in which the right is doubtful. I have no hesitation whatever in saying after examining carefully this case in committee, that if there is any case whatever in which a pension to date back ought to be granted by special act, it is this case. I feel that the facts in this case plainly indicate that this particular pensioner lost the obtainment of his pension at the Pension Office because of the malignity of one of the officers of the Government upon the vessel of which he was an officer.

The facts as found by the House committee and as also found by the Senate committee show that the assistant surgeon upon this vessel was the personal enemy of this man, and it is testified by a number of officers upon the vessel and by the privates on the vessel that he made a false entry upon the log or journal of the vessel, that this man was attacked with pneumonia as the result of the excessive use of alcoholic spirits, when the truth was that he was a sober, faithful, useful, and efficient officer, and the charge was utterly untrue and utterly malicious. But for this falsehood there can be no doubt whatever that this man would have obtained his pension at the Pension Office in the regular manner and would have been entitled to arrears.

Such are the facts of the case; and if the Senate proposes to make any exception whatever to the rule adopted by the Senate Committee on Pensions that arrears of pensions are not to be granted by special act, then I concede most cheerfully to the Senator from Kentucky that this is a proper case for this exception. At the same time, if the Senate is willing to be governed by a rule about the matter, I think it would be very well, although it is a case of great hardship to this particular citizen, that the rule of the Senate committee should be adhered to and that arrears of pension should not be granted. I feel, however, bound to give the Senator from Kentucky the advantage of the statement I have made after a full and thorough examination.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I would suggest to the chairman of the committee and also to the Senator from Kentucky whether it would not be better to pass over this case, as it is likely to excite a discussion which will bring up the whole question whether the Senate under any circumstances will grant arrears of pensions by a special act. That question cannot be disposed of except with a somewhat extended discussion. I would suggest, therefore, that this case be passed over by consent, as was the case of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. WITHERS. I am perfectly willing it shall take that course myself.

Mr. BECK. That will be the last of it this session. If not disposed of now, there is no chance for it.

Mr. WITHERS. We can call it up again. There is one thing certain, that we cannot consent to the granting of arrears of pensions in these cases by special acts without a more protracted debate than I feel authorized to intrude upon the present consideration of the appropriation bill, as I merely hold the floor now by the courtesy of the Senator who has charge of that bill.

Mr. BECK. The case is so extraordinary and so fair that I do not like to let it go, and if the Senator will call it up again——

Mr. WITHERS. I will say to the Senator from Kentucky that there is scarcely a case of a pension granted by these special acts in which the same claim is not made. Some cases, of course, are much stronger than others; the equities are stronger in some cases than in others; but in each and every case the friends of the parties think they are entitled to arrears of pension.

Mr. BECK. I suppose it is better for the applicant to let the amendment pass and go on.

Mr. WITHERS. I think so.

Mr. BECK. If that is not done, I fear the bill will be lost altogether.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment.

The question being put, the Chair declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether this amendment is the amendment recommended by the committee, cutting off arrears.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands it to be the amendment recommended by the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It appears to me that it would be very extraordinary for the Senate after having cut off arrears in a good many of the pension cases that we have already passed, now to allow arrears in this case. We ought to adopt one rule that should apply to everybody alike. I think I am safe in saying that.

Mr. COCKRELL. The committee recommended in this case the striking off of arrears.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the Chair, as I understand, said that the amendment was disagreed to, which leaves the provision for arrears to stand.

Mr. COCKRELL. I did not hear it put to the vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair put the question and there was certainly one more in the negative than affirmative, inasmuch as no one voted but the Chair.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for another vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question again.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was proceeding to say that it seemed to me it would be very extraordinary for the Senate to have rejected all the applications for arrears down to this case, and then to disagree with the committee and allowing arrears in it, and I was calling the attention of the Senate to the value of something like consistency in the disposition of these cases. So I hope the Senate will agree with the committee and agree to the amendment striking out the arrears.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Pensions.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

WIDOW AND CHILDREN OF MICHAEL MEENAN.

Mr. WITHERS. I move next to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2331.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 2331) granting pensions to the widow and minor children of Michael Meenan, deceased.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 12, after the word "after," to strike out "May 15, 1876, the day of the death of the aforesaid Corporal Meenan," and insert "the passage of this act;" so as to make the section read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place upon the pension-roll, at the rate of $8 per month, the name of Emma Meenan, widow of Michael Meenan, deceased, late a corporal in Company E, Second Regiment Delaware Volunteers; also the names of Mary Meenan, William Meenan, George Meenan, and Edward Meenan, minor children of the said Michael Meenan, deceased, at the rate of $2 each per month, the said pensions to be payable to the parties hereinbefore named, respectively, from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I want three minutes of the attention of the Senate that I may give the reasons why I think this amendment ought not to be adopted.

On the 26th of February, 1879, the Senate passed a bill for the relief of these parties just as the other House passed this bill the other day. The measure therefore had received the approval of the Senate that the widow and orphan children of this poor and brave man who lost his right arm at Gettysburgh and had from the Government a pension at the time of his death, his death being the result of his wounds, should have his pension from the day of his death. This woman has struggled in poverty; she has kept these little children by the labor of her own hands; they are still of tender years; their father gave his life in the cause of his country; and the Senate have approved the bill that continues this poor pension to the widow and children after his death.

That was the bill of 1879 passed by this body. The House of Representatives passed the identical bill. It comes back now and is proposed to be amended by the committee by dating the pension from the date of the act and not giving it from the day of this man's death. It is necessary in this case to pass a special bill; the general pension law does not provide for it, and therefore when we pass the special bill it is not in conflict with any general law; it is not in conflict with any general principle, but it seems it is in conflict with a rule which has been made by the committee upon this subject of arrears of pension. Here is a small sum for those who need it, in the name of one who earned it, and therefore I trust the Senate will not throw this bill at this stage of the session back into the House. It is adding months that are weary months, that are months of delay, of pain, and of suffering to these poor people, and I beg that the Senate will not here ten days before the adjournment throw such a bill back into the House for the sake of amending it in this particular.

Mr. WITHERS. I have simply to say in reply to the remarks of the Senator from Delaware that the bill as it stands is not in conflict with any law or any principle, but in my opinion it does conflict directly with a principle which has controlled the Senate committee in its action on these cases and that principle is that in every special act granting a pension there must necessarily be a defect in the proof or there would be no necessity for applying to Congress for its action. If the proof had been clear and conclusive that the death of this soldier was caused by his wounds at Gettysburgh, and that his death was clearly traceable to that cause, as the Senator alleges, why the necessity of applying to Congress for a special act? The pension would have been granted in the Pension Bureau, and in this, as in every other special act, there is a defect in evidence, and consequently that principle is involved in the action of the Senate committee in declining to grant arrears.

Mr. BAYARD. I submit to the Senator that it stands here amply supported by two reports in the two Houses. There is no doubt whatever, as stated by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. McPHERSON] from the Committee on Pensions in his report of the 28th of January and by Mr. COFFROTH in the House on the 20th of February, 1880, that—

The deceased was enlisted on the 1st day of July, 1861, and discharged on the 18th day of April, 1864, on account of the amputation of his right arm, rendered necessary by a wound received at the battle of Gettysburgh.

There is ample proof, also, that the death of the deceased was caused by a lung disease, following an attack of acute pneumonia which was induced by the suffering and weakness resulting from the loss of his arm. He received a pension to the time of his death, and this with what he could earn was the sole support of his family.

The committee therefore report back the bill, and recommend its passage.

And the Senate report is directly to the same effect.

Mr. WITHERS. If the connection between the disease of the lungs which occasioned this man's death and the wounds received in battle had been clearly demonstrated, as the Senator alleges, the widow would never have come to Congress for a pension; it would have been granted at the Bureau of Pensions. But the medical authorities, the medical referees and others, pronounced adversely to the claim because this connection was not proved to have existed, and therefore she had to apply to Congress for relief.

Mr. BAYARD. It is a very strange thing that two committees have been found to reverse the facts stated by the honorable Senator.

Mr. WITHERS. Not at all strange. We very frequently find that to be the case.

Mr. McPHERSON. As a member of a sub-committee of the Committee on Pensions, I reported the House bill back to the committee, pure and simple, without amendment, believing as I did that the testimony was overwhelming in favor of the fact that this widow and these children were entitled to a pension. A rule of the Senate Committee on Pensions declining to give arrears of pension upon any special act caused the committee to instruct me to report the bill to the Senate with the amendment. I believe that if there is any case that stands entirely alone with respect to its justice, this is the one. This poor widow has protected and supported these dependent infant children; one of them I think is only five years of age, and their ages range from five to twelve. She has supported them for four long years, and she asks now and the House bill proposes that the pension be granted to her from the death of her husband, dating from the year 1876. I believe it to be just, and I shall vote in favor of granting the pension to this needy widow and these orphan children from 1876.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the reading of the Senator's report, so as to see whether it sustains the speech he has just made or not.

Mr. McPHERSON. I will state for the information of the Senator from Missouri, that contrary to my expectation I find that the report as printed is not as full as it was sent to the Printer. Some portion of the report has accidentally been omitted, but I can supply I think anything that the report lacks with respect to the facts therein mentioned.

Mr. COCKRELL. Here is a copy of the report; let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. McPHERSON on the 28th of January, 1881:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2331) granting pensions to the widow and minor children of Michael Meenan, deceased, submit the following report:

The deceased was enlisted on the 1st day of July, 1861, and discharged on the 18th day of April, 1864, on account of the amputation of his right arm, rendered necessary by a wound received at the battle of Gettysburgh, for which he received a pension up to the time of his death.

Dr. Johnson, who attended Meenan, stated in his evidence that Meenan's vitality had been so much reduced by the excessive loss of blood at the time of amputation, and a subsequent disease of the bowels while still in hospital, that he was unable to resist a pulmonary disease following an attack of pneumonia. Other physicians certify to the same fact.

The committee recommend the passage of the bill as amended.

Mr. CALL. I hope the Senate will not concur in the amendment proposed by the committee. It seems to me such a proposition is entirely without reason. It may be very well as a matter of policy in a great many cases not to grant arrears; but why make the distinction in the case of widows and orphans? The law provides that in the case of a man entitled to a pension he shall have it and have the arrears; but if his widow and orphans come before the Commissioner and the Commissioner decides adversely on the evidence, and they appeal to Congress, and they decide that there is sufficient evidence in the case, that the Commissioner erred, the committee hold that in the case of a woman and her children, the orphans and widow of a deceased soldier, shall not have the arrears which the man himself would, or his dependent relatives, have had, which the express provision of the statute says is due them. By section 4718 it is provided:

If any pensioner has died or shall hereafter die; or if any person entitled to a pension, having an application therefor pending, has died or shall hereafter die, his widow, or if there is no widow, the child or children of such person under the age of sixteen years, shall be entitled to receive the accrued pension to the date of the death of such person.

The committee have adopted a rule that if the Commissioner decides upon the evidence that a person is entitled to a pension, he shall receive arrears; but if the committee decide that the Commissioner of Pensions erred in his opinion, and that upon the evidence he should have granted the pension, in that case the pension shall not be given to the children and widow of the deceased soldier from the date of the death, but only from the passage of the law. They thus make the error or mistake of the Commissioner in deciding on the weight of evidence a reason for depriving the widow and children and perhaps the orphans of a deceased soldier of the arrears or accrued pension which the law gives them.

I affirm that there is no reason in the distinction which the committee make; it is contrary to the express purpose and provision of the law, and the honorable chairman of the Committee on Pensions, with his great ability and his great zeal to do justice to the pensioners and to the Government, cannot point out a single reason why those who above all others should be the beneficiaries of the law and of the bounty or the obligation of the Government, the widows and children of deceased soldiers and aged pensioners, should not have the benefit of this provision. Why give arrears to those who are in the prime of life, and refuse it to the widows and the orphan children of the deceased soldiers? There can be no reason for the proposition that when the Committee on Pensions have decided that the Commissioner erred, either in the application of the law or in deciding on the weight of the evidence, they should refuse to do what the law in all other cases does, give a pension to the widow and children from the date of his death, including his accrued pension.

I submit to the Senate and to Senators who so earnestly defend the rights of soldiers to these arrears of pension that when a soldier dies with an accrued pension due him, and when the law vests by express terms a right to that accrued pension in his widow and children, and Congress decides that upon the evidence the widow and children have a right to the continuance of his pension, neither the committee nor the Senate nor Congress have the right to deprive the widow and children of the accrued pension. If there is a vested right anywhere it is in such a case. The law prescribes the conditions upon which the soldier and, after his death, his widow and children shall have a pension.

These conditions and the means by which they are proved are entirely distinct. The conditions upon which the law vests the pensions cannot be changed by an error of the Commissioner or any one else in deciding on the weight of evidence, and when the committee and the Senate decide that these conditions of fact do exist, that the soldier died of wounds or disease incurred in the service and in the line of duty, and when in such a case, at the time of his death, there is an accrued pension due him, or when the law prescribes that the widow's or childrens' pension shall commence from his death, is it not apparent that the committee having found the fact of military service, of death from wounds or disease incurred in the service and in the line of duty, they cannot with any reason nor without violating a vested right say, "True it is, the soldier died of disease or wounds received in the service and in the line of duty; the law gives his widow in such a case a pension dating from his death, but inasmuch as the Commissioner has, in the judgment of the Senate, failed to decide this case according to the law, the widow and the orphan shall by this fault or failure of the Commissioner be deprived of their right under the law." There is neither reason nor justice in such a proposition, and I hope that the Senate will not sustain it by their vote on this amendment.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, every case which comes before the Senate in which arrears of pension are asked is represented to be a peculiar case. Now, I apprehend that almost all of these cases stand about on the same ground. The Senate has declined heretofore, it has declined to-day, to allow the principle of granting arrears where we pass a special act giving a pension to obtain. It did it in the case advocated by the Senator from Kentucky, which it seems to me was fully as meritorious a case as this. Any one who has been on the Pensions Committee knows how hard it is for a member of that committee to resist the appeals which are made to his sympathy; but there ought to be some rule about this, and the Senate has heretofore adopted the rule in the consideration of all cases, so far as I know, that in granting pensions by special act they shall be made to commence from the date of the passage of the act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That has been the rule for fifteen years to my knowledge.

Mr. PLATT. It has been the rule, as suggested by the Senator from Vermont, for fifteen years. Now, if we break over it in one case, no matter how strongly that case may appeal to our sympathies, that is the end of the rule, and it must inevitably open the gates through which will pour an innumerable list of applications. If this pension is to be granted to go back of the passage of the act, I have in my mind a case in which I have been appealed to this very morning, which I can present here, I believe with stronger reason why arrears of pension should be granted, and it seems to me that the Senate must face the question in this way: either refuse arrears in all cases, or open the door in all cases.

Most of the pensions granted by special act amount to little more than gratuity pensions. They are like this case where it is insisted that the pneumonia of which the soldier died resulted from the loss of his arm at the battle of Gettysburgh. Medical men to whom that question might be referred would, I think, say that it was impossible, and yet medical men have been found to say that in their opinion it may have been so. The Commissioner of Pensions, relying upon the medical authority in the Pension Office, decides that the cause of death cannot be traced to the wound received in service. The applicant comes here to Congress; we give her the benefit of any doubt that may exist on that subject, and we give her a pension. That is all there is of it. It is little more than a bare gratuity pension; but we recognize her need; we recognize the services of her husband, and, if there be any doubt in the case, we say we will grant her a pension by special act. As I said before, it seems to me we must stand firm in resisting these appeals to our sympathies, or we must open the door in all such cases.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have asked the Secretary to furnish me the original papers in this case. I desire to submit them to the Senate. There seems to be a contradictory view of the evidence and the facts in this case taken even by members of the committee, and it is only fair that the Senate should have the benefit of the testimony upon which these different reports were made. My friend from New Jersey makes a speech; it is very beautiful, it is pathetic, it is touching, but he has a written report here, and the facts stated in his speech are not stated in the report. I want to know upon what I am to act, whether upon the speech made to-day or upon the report made heretofore?

Mr. McPHERSON. I supposed the Senator fully understood me when I rose in my place and stated to him that the report was not very full, and that I proposed to add something to the report from my recollection of the testimony, which should have appeared in the report itself, but accidentally had been left out. Therefore the Senator must not say that my speech and my report do not agree; but my speech was explanatory of the testimony.

Mr. WITHERS. I recollect the case distinctly. The testimony of the attending physician was quoted in the report which has been read by the Senator from Delaware. The report, however, of the medical examiners and the medical referee was that there was no evidence to sustain the connection between the injury received and the death of the person. The man lost his arm in 1864 and died in 1876, twelve years afterward, of a disease following an attack of pneumonia. The medical referee says that there is no connection proved between the injury and the disease.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. WITHERS. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the honorable chairman of the committee then tell me why the Committee on Pensions agreed to pension the widow immediately after the passage of this act if there was no connection whatever between the injury and the disease? If the man did not die from disease contracted in the service, then the Committee on Pensions should not have brought in a report to grant his widow a pension at all. This case stands solely and entirely upon whether the Committee on Pensions will make this a case granting a pension to the widow from the year 1876, the date of the death of Corporal Meenan, or whether it will be granted after the passage of the act. I submit if this lady is not entitled to a pension at all, then the bill should not have been reported favorably for any amendment which the Senate might choose to make to it.

Mr. WITHERS. I yielded to the Senator for a question or a remark and not for a speech; and the Senator might have saved himself the speech for I should have answered the point which he raises. The Senator wants to know why it is that the committee reported in favor of granting a pension at all if there was no connection established between the injury and the disease. I quoted this evidence to show that there was a conflict of testimony upon the case, and that the connection was not clearly established between the injury received and the subsequent death of the person. The reason, I presume, which caused the Committee on Pensions to report favorably upon this application for a pension was, that they gave to this poor woman and her infant children the benefit of the doubt and allowed her to have a pension, the right to which was not clearly established under the law. That was the reason, and the sole reason.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator what would be the amount if this pension is allowed?

Mr. WITHERS. I have not calculated it, but it would run back over four years. It would be a certain amount for the widow and so much for her children. The committee, I will here say, have not been actuated by the amount of money involved in these cases, but they have acted upon the general principle which I have distinctly stated, that as there was always a defect in the character of the evidence to sustain these applications for pension which requires them to come to Congress, in their judgment the provision in the arrears-of-pensions act should not apply to them, and that position is sustained by the fact that when the arrears-of-pensions act was passed it was distinctly avowed and proclaimed upon the floor of the Senate that its provisions should not apply to special cases.

Mr. BECK. I do not propose to discuss this question, but to say that in the case lately up, of Captain Robert S. Goodall, notwithstanding the very earnest, truthful, and vigorous statement made in behalf of Captain Goodall by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GROOME,] I had to accept the amendment offered by the Committee on Pensions, and I do not see how the committee can consent to any exception being made when they would not allow it in the case of Captain Goodall, who is a man now old, nearly blind, bed-ridden. I had to accept what the committee saw fit to give in order to keep him from becoming an object of charity. I shall surely introduce a separate bill to give him arrears of pension, and shall endeavor to get it through the Senate; but I do not see if the rule is to be established how we can vary it in this or any other case and pass over that. I can understand very well (and for that reason I did not insist upon rejecting the amendment in the other case) how the Committee on Pensions, acting upon those cases that were not sufficiently clear to enable the Commissioner of Pensions to act, will give the pension now, reserving to each one hereafter the right to present a claim for arrears of pension. If it is established that that is reserved, I believe I shall sustain the committee in all that class of cases, as being the only way in which the claimants can get anything, because if you bring up the question in one case it will come up in another. No more meritorious case was ever presented than the one in which I had to allow the amendment to be passed awhile ago in order to get anything.

Mr. WITHERS. I hope we shall proceed to the consideration of other pension bills on the Calendar, as the Senator from Missouri has called for the papers in this case.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am very anxious to have the papers to settle this difficulty. I have applied to the Secretary, and they are not in the Secretary's office. I have applied to the clerk of the Committee on Pensions, and he informs me that the papers have been returned to the Pension Office. I have sent a telegram to the Commissioner of Pensions to have them sent here. I shall have them here just as quickly as I can get them.

Mr. WITHERS. Then I move that the bill be passed over temporarily, and that we proceed to the consideration of the next pension bill on the Calendar reported favorably.

Mr. BAYARD. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion. I am asking this for children who I know are needing this money. They need bread. Their father gave his life, and his children are entitled to bread from the country; and if they are to have half the loaf cut off they had better have that. Therefore I beg the Senate to act on the amendment although I think it very unjust.

Mr. WITHERS. If the Senator from Delaware agrees that the amendment shall be passed upon, and is willing to accept the bill as amended, I withdraw the motion to lay it aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Pensions.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM H. SCRIBNER.

Mr. WITHERS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 859) granting a pension to William H. Scribner.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll the name of William H. Scribner, late a private in Company E of the Third Regiment of New York Cavalry Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELLEN M. GODFREY.

Mr. WITHERS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1637) granting a pension to Ellen M. Godfrey.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll the name of Ellen M. Godfrey, widow of the late James A. Godfrey, captain of Company G, Eighteenth Regiment Maine Volunteer Infantry, subsequently First Maine Heavy Artillery, at the rate of $20 per month, from March 3, 1878.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 8 to strike out the words "at the rate of $20 per month from March 3, A. D. 1878."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRANK KITZMILLER.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 7101) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 1487) to restore the lands included in the Fort Reading and Fort Crook military reservations, in the State of California, to the public domain, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 6599) to change the time for holding circuit and district courts of the United States for the western district of Virginia, held at Danville, Virginia.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask that the legislative appropriation bill, which has just come from the House, be laid before the Senate now in order that it may be referred and printed. We want to get to work on it as soon as possible.

The bill (H. R. No. 7101) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 6972) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

Mr. WALLACE. The bill being before the Senate, I shall briefly state its contents and then ask the Senate to proceed with it in detail and pass upon the amendments offered by the Committee on Appropriations before permitting any other amendment to be offered to the bill.

The bill is the regular annual appropriation bill for the purpose of carrying on the Post-Office Department. It makes appropriations as reported to the Senate amounting to $41,147,432. The amount added to the bill as it came from the House by the Senate Committee on Appropriations is $297,000. The bill as it came from the House contained appropriations amounting to $40,850,432. The amount of estimates submitted by the Department as necessary for the use of the Department during the fiscal year 1882 is $42,475,932. The bill as reported by the Senate Committee on Appropriations is less than the estimates, $1,328,500. The amount appropriated for these purposes for the current fiscal year was $39,093,420. The bill as reported by the Committee on Appropriations exceeds the bill reported and passed for 1881 by $2,054,012. The estimated postal revenues for 1882 are $38,845,174.10. The bill as reported to the Senate exceeds the estimated postal revenues for the coming fiscal year by $2,302,257.90.

I may be permitted to congratulate the Senate and the country upon the rapid tendency of this Department toward the ability to sustain itself, even with the low rate of postage that now prevails throughout the country. I append a statement showing the expenditures, revenues, and Treasury grants in reference to the Post-Office Department for the last ten years:

*Appropriations. †Estimated revenues.
‡Appropriations recommended by Senate Committee.

It will be seen that there was a continued increase in the amount necessary to be appropriated from the Treasury from 1871 to 1877, when it culminated in requiring actual appropriations out of the Treasury to sustain this Department of a grand total of $7,013,300. Since that time the amount appropriated out of the Treasury necessary to sustain the Department has decreased, until last year the amount appropriated from the Treasury to sustain the Department was but $3,883,420, while by this bill the amount necessary, taking into consideration the revenues estimated by the Department, is but $2,302,257, or a million and a half less than it was necessary to appropriate last year out of the Treasury to sustain the Department. While the total expenditures of the Department in 1871, ten years ago, were $24,390,000 in round numbers, they are this year $41,147,000. The total revenues in 1871 were but $20,037,000, while they are estimated for this year to be $38,845,000, thus showing not only the growth of the business of the Post-Office Department but the growth of the demand of the country for postal accommodations, and the absolute necessity for that branch of the Government which controls appropriations to recognize the fact that the Post-Office is one of the Departments which must keep pace with the growth of the country. The Committee on Appropriations have in that spirit treated the bill as it came from the House. They have in the House given very free appropriations to all the purposes necessary for conducting this service.

In the Senate we have carefully examined the wants of the Department as laid before us by the officials of the Department, and have added to the appropriations made by the House $297,000. These items are composed, first, of an additional amount for the preparation and publication of postal maps, $5,000. Forty-five thousand dollars was given by the House, and we have added $5,000 to this amount, making the total $50,000. For rent of building for money order office, $15,000. That is for rent and furniture. On a careful examination by the committee into the condition of the Post-Office Department, we found that men are crowded there too much. The basement is occupied with clerks, six or eight in a room, and we found that it was necessary to do something to relieve the pressure upon the room that we found to exist in that Department. We have accordingly recommended, in accordance with the request of the Postmaster-General, the appropriation of $15,000 toward the rent of a building and the furniture for the building, for the purpose of accommodating the money-order office of the Post-Office Department, and the money-order clerks of the Auditor's Office of the Post-Office Department. The force amounts to about one hundred and fifty clerks, and this branch of the service can well be taken out of the general Department, because the connection with it is of that character that it can be isolated and placed in a building by itself. We have also added to the appropriation of $8,000 for letter balances, test-weights, and scales, $2,000, making the total $10,000. For special facilities on trunk lines we have added $50,000, in accordance with the recommendations of the Postmaster-General and his assistants, and to meet what seemed to us to be a decided necessity in the Southwest. We have added to the appropriation for rent, lights, and fuel in country offices, or in post-offices at a distance from Washington, $25,000; we have added for inland transportation by steamboat routes, $50,000; for inland transportation by star routes, $125,000; for mail-locks and keys, $10,000; and for mail-bags and mail-bag catchers, $15,000; making a total of $297,000 added to the bill by the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

These are the changes, and as the amendments come before the Senate in the reading of the bill, I will call attention to them in detail, if necessary, and explain the reasons why your committee have made these recommendations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The bill will be read at length, and unless there is objection, the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations will be acted upon as they are reached in order in the reading of the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after the word "dollars," in line 21, to strike out:

And hereafter the Postmaster-General shall cause advertisements of all general mail-lettings of each State and Territory to be conspicuously posted up in each post-office in the State and Territory embraced in said advertisements for at least sixty days before the time of such general letting; and no other advertisements of such lettings shall be required; but this provision shall not apply to any other than general mail-lettings;

And in lieu thereof to insert:

And hereafter the Postmaster-General shall cause a condensed advertisement of all general mail-lettings of each State and Territory and of the District of Columbia, as required by the provisions of an act approved May 17, 1878, entitled "An act to regulate the advertising of mail-lettings, and for other purposes," to be published in the District of Columbia, in accordance with the provisions of the act approved January 21, 1881, entitled "An act to regulate the award of and compensation for public advertising in the District of Columbia," and in addition thereto shall cause advertisements of all general mail-lettings in each State to be inserted in not exceeding ten newspapers published in the State or Territory in which such service is to be let, in manner and form as required by the act approved May 17, 1878. He shall also cause said advertisements to be conspicuously posted up in each post-office in the State and Territory embraced in said advertisements for at least sixty days before the time of such general letting; and no other advertisement of such lettings shall be required; but this provision shall not apply to any other than general mail-lettings.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 53, to increase the appropriation "for preparation and publication of post-route maps, including revision of former editions, and maps, diagrams, and other information," from $45,000 to $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the clause appropriating for miscellaneous items in the office of the Postmaster-General, after the word "dollars," in line 59, to insert:

And the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to take the necessary steps to rent a suitable building or buildings for the use of the money-order office of the Post-Office Department and of the money-order division of the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department: Provided, That the rent of such building or buildings, and the cost of necessary furniture for the same, to be procured under the supervision of the superintendent of the money-order system, shall be paid out of the proceeds of the money-order business: And provided further, That the annual rental of such building or buildings shall not exceed the sum of $5,000, and the cost of the furniture for the same shall not exceed $10,000.

Mr. WALLACE. I move to amend the last proviso of the amendment by inserting in line 68, after the word "the," the words "cost of the;" after the word "buildings," in line 69, to insert "and of the furniture;" in line 70, before the word "thousand," to strike out "five" and insert "fifteen," and to strike out all after the word "dollars," in the same line; so as to read:

And provided further, That the cost of the annual rental of such building or buildings, and of the furniture, shall not exceed the sum of $15,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 82, to increase the appropriation "for letter-balances, test-weights, and scales" from $8,000 to $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 84, to increase the appropriation "for rent, lights, and fuel" from $425,000 to $450,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 94, after the word "dollars," to insert:

And the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to expend not to exceed $25,000 thereof for special railroad service between the union depot in East Saint Louis, Illinois, and the union depot in Saint Louis, Missouri; and such sum shall include depot room and transfer service at each terminal.

So as to make the clause read:

Office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General:

For inland mail transportation, namely: For transportation on railroad routes, $9,488,282; and the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to expend not to exceed $25,000 thereof for special railroad service between the union depot in East Saint Louis, Illinois, and the union depot in Saint Louis, Missouri; and such sum shall include depot room and transfer service at each terminal.

Mr. VEST. I move to amend the amendment in line 95 by striking out "$25,000" and inserting "$30,000." I presume there will be no objection on the part of the committee to that amendment. It will then read:

And the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to expend not to exceed $30,000 thereof, &c.

Mr. WALLACE. It is due to the committee to say that they were under the impression that this service could be rendered for $25,000, but it is also the fact that the representatives of the parties who have the control of the only facilities that may be obtained, fix the amount at $30,000, and in order to obtain what is indispensable to the expediting of the mails through Saint Louis, or from East Saint Louis to the Southwest, we must have those facilities. Therefore, the committee will make no special objection to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BECK. I only desire to add that I shall vote to appropriate $30,000, because both the Senators from Missouri and the Representatives from that State assured us that without that amount the service cannot be performed, and the risk would be run of missing the mail; and even at $30,000 the service is paid for at a much less rate than rich companies carrying the same class of cars over other railroads are paid.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after the word "safetyheaters," in line 104, to insert "and safety-lamps;" so as to make the clause read:

And hereafter when any railroad company fail or refuse to provide railway post-office cars when required by the Post-Office Department, or shall fail or refuse to provide suitable safety-heaters and safety-lamps therefor, with such number of saws and axes to each car for use in case of accident as may be required by the Post-Office Department, said company shall have its pay reduced 10 per cent. on the rates fixed in section 4002 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by act of July 12, 1876, &c.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I should like to ask the Senator having the bill in charge a question. Representations have been made to me in view of a recent terrible accident that happened to our postal cars, in which some of the postal clerks or agents were burned, of the desirability of having something to extinguish fire, some patent or other process, the name of which I forget.

Mr. WALLACE. Babcock's extinguisher?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Yes. Did the Committee on Appropriations consider the propriety of that?

Mr. WALLACE. They did consider it, and they gave a hearing to persons interested in that subject, and the conclusion of the committee was not to put that on the bill.

Mr. BECK. We had the opinion of the Department.

Mr. WALLACE. The officials of the Department were brought before us, and they did not recommend it to us in the least.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I merely wished to make the inquiry, as I knew the matter had been suggested.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriation was, in line 121, to increase the appropriation "for necessary and special facilities on trunk lines" from $400,000 to $450,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 123, to increase the appropriation "for inland transportation by steamboat routes" from $900,000 to $950,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 124, to increase the appropriation "for inland transportation by star routes" from $7,875,000 to $8,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 137, to increase the appropriation "for mail locks and keys" from $15,000 to $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 139, to increase the appropriation "for mail bags and mail-bag catchers" from $185,000 to $200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 166, before the word "postal" to insert "single and return;" so as to read:

For manufacture of single and return postal cards, $296,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "dollars," in line 167, in the item for the manufacture of postal cards, to insert:

And the Postmaster-General shall fix the kind and number of each of the same to be manufactured; and the cost of said return cards shall not exceed 25 per cent. in addition to the cost of the same number of single cards.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Pennsylvania. The matter of these return postal cards was before the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and if my recollection is right the double card has been patented.

Mr. EATON. If my friend will excuse me for one moment, as one of the Committee on Appropriations I propose to offer an amendment which perhaps will meet the idea of my friend from Iowa.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I was about doing that myself. I will merely state the point I wish to get at, and then I will hear the Senator from Connecticut. The double or return postal card is said to be patented. I am afraid, taking the language as it stands here, we shall not only have to pay for the manufacture of the cards, but that before very long there will be a large claim against the Postmaster-General and against the Government through him on behalf of the patentee.

Mr. EATON. Will my friend hear my amendment?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Very well; perhaps it will suit better than my own.

Mr. EATON. There was some little difference of opinion in the committee upon this clause. I would amend it by inserting after the word "cards," in line 170, "including the cost of the right to the use of any invention therefor, shall be determined by the Postmaster-General," striking out the words "shall not exceed 25 per cent. in addition to the cost of the same number of single cards," so that it would read:

And the cost of said return-cards, including the cost of the right to the use of any invention therefor, shall be determined by the Postmaster-General.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. That covers the amendment I was about to offer, and I am perfectly content with it.

Mr. WALLACE. I think there is no special objection to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut. We must get control of the patent if we intend to use the double card, and as the amount is not increased and the Postmaster-General has control of the number, I think the amendment may very properly go on the bill.

Mr. KERNAN. I desire to inquire whether there will then be any limit at all to the price to be paid for the invention, except the discretion of the Postmaster-General?

Mr. EATON. None at all. As one member of the committee, I think I can trust the Postmaster-General to fix the price that he pays for the double card, as we trust him in regard to the price he pays for the single card.

Mr. KERNAN. I did not know but that there was a limit upon the amount appropriated.

Mr. EATON. The amount is limited to the sum fixed in the bill. The price is at the discretion of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. WALLACE. The amount appropriated is left as it is in the bill, and the Postmaster-General is vested with discretion as to how many of each kind of these cards, single and double, he will order to be printed.

Mr. KERNAN. He has $296,000 to do it with?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes; $296,000. As a matter of course, the discretion is a pretty large one, but we have given to a certain extent the same discretion to him. The discretion in regard to postal cards is one which I think we can safely vest in the Postmaster-General, and I think the words proposed by the Senator from Connecticut are proper.

Mr. BECK. I am not able to agree as to the propriety of allowing the discretion to the extent that is now proposed. I believe that a portion of the amendment, including the cost of the right to the use of any invention therefor, is proper, because every one of the different inventions is patented, and unless some limitation is put upon the Postmaster-General, if we leave it in this shape the Postmaster-General will select his own patentee, because he has got to select some patentee, and then he may pay that patentee whatever he likes, whether it is the exact value or double the value of the thing presented, and Congress is simply abandoning to the Postmaster-General the double right to select the patentee he likes best and give whatever that patentee sees fit to demand, and Congress is abandoning all authority over any limitation in regard to the patent. Twenty-five per cent. may not be enough, 40 per cent. perhaps may be required, but it is a very wide discretion to leave it to any Postmaster-General to select first the patentee and then determine the price which is to be paid.

Mr. EATON. Only a word. I think the committee safely left the discretion with the Postmaster-General. I am perfectly satisfied and was, my friend will remember, that 25 per cent. is not enough. It might be 40, it might be 45, it might be 50; but can we not trust to the chief officer of the Department, the Postmaster-General? Here is a double card which is a great advantage to the Government in this regard: if I want to write a note or send a postal card to my friend from Kentucky he might not take any notice of it whatever unless I sent a stamp; therefore I send a double postal card and pay the postage myself of two cents, and if my friend from Kentucky chooses he will return the card; if he does not the Government gets its two cents any way. It strikes me that it would be a great advantage to the community, and the discretion which is to be given to the Postmaster-General seems to me to be necessary in this case. I agree with my friend from Kentucky in fixing the appropriations ourselves, leaving as little to the heads of the Departments as possible, but in this instance I am satisfied that 25 per cent. is not enough, we could not have the double card at all, and therefore I would leave it discretionary with the Postmaster-General.

Mr. BOOTH. I agree with the Senator from Connecticut that this will be a very great convenience and a considerable profit to the United States. An examination of the devices submitted to the committee satisfies me, not only that it will not cost 25 per cent. in addition to making the single postal card, but that it will not cost 10 per cent. more. The whole value of the improvement is in the patent. Two stamps are placed upon the cards with the same impression, and the only additional device is a piece of paper pasted upon the back of the card that can be torn off. While its adoption will be of very great advantage to the United States, its adoption with the liberty to the Postmaster-General to accept it without limitation will be of very much more advantage to the patentees. I do not think that a device of that kind ought to be patented. If it should be patented at all, it is so simple that it should be the idea, and that is not original. Foreign governments are using them; the suggestion came from other governments. I should be very much more inclined to reduce the limit from 25 per cent. to 10 per cent. than to increase it.

Mr. EATON. I think my friend from California is entirely mistaken in his idea of the expense. If his theory be correct we are paying to-day 50 per cent. more than we ought for the single postal card. I undertake to say, and I think my friend will hardly contradict the assertion, that the little strip of paper, which he says can be easily torn off, is the very thing that costs more than the other strip of paper for which we now pay seventy-five cents on the hundred. That is my view about it. There are half a dozen kinds of double postal cards. Where they are made, or who the manufacturers are, I do not know. I have never seen one of them, and have only heard from one of them. I am perfectly satisfied that my friend is mistaken when he thinks that the double postal card can be made for one-quarter of a cent instead of three-quarters of a cent, as it costs for the other postal card.

Mr. MAXEY. The question of return postal cards is one which has been before the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads quite a number of times, and has been very thoroughly discussed. I doubt myself the feasibility of the plan of double postal cards, and not believing it to be of importance, but believing that the money expended should be upon the ordinary postal cards such as we have, I move to amend in line 166 by striking out "and return" after "single," and in line 168 by striking out the words "of each."

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HOAR in the chair.) The Chair will state to the Senator from Texas that the amendment in line 166 has been agreed to, as the Chair is informed by the Chief Clerk. The present occupant of the chair was not here when action took place upon it.

Mr. MAXEY. The amendment is not yet completed, nor should a vote have been taken except on the whole paragraph.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can get at his object very easily by moving to reconsider the vote on the amendment or by unanimous consent. The Chair understands that the amendment in line 166 inserting the words "single and return" has been acted upon by the Senate. The Senate have passed from that amendment, and the next amendment is in the same paragraph, beginning in line 167. The Chair understood the motion of the Senator from Texas to include the words "and return," which words have been inserted by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. MAXEY. The point I desire to make is simply this: I have investigated the matter somewhat, and I do not believe that the return cards will be an improvement upon our present system of communication. I do not believe that it would be wise on the part of the Government to pay a royalty for that which is practically of no real service. I do not believe that the whole $296,000 could be well expended in the manufacture of postal cards such as are now in use. The whole object I have in view is to limit the appropriation, not to increase it, but to limit it to the manufacture of postal cards.

Mr. HAMLIN. I confess I was very glad to hear the suggestion of the Senator from Texas, the chairman of the Post-Office Committee. I think he struck the nail precisely on the head. The return card ought not to be in the bill in any way. It is a tax upon the Department, which returns no commensurate revenue for that tax. The postal-card system is subserved by the single card, which may contribute, and does contribute, to the revenues of the Department. I did not understand the Senator from Connecticut to say precisely what the double cards would cost; but I think I did understand him to say that they would cost 75 per cent. more than the single cards. Am I right?

Mr. EATON. No; I did not say that.

Mr. HAMLIN. Did the Senator say what they would cost, or does the Senator have information that would enable him to tell me?

Mr. EATON. My judgment is that the double card will cost from 40 to 50 per cent. more than the single card.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not propose to discuss the matter now; but when it shall be in order for the Senator from Texas to move his amendment I shall perhaps have a little something to say.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. Do I understand the Senator to say that the Post-Office Committee have examined this question and believe it is not wise to adopt the double card?

Mr. HAMLIN. I cannot answer distinctly. I have been by indisposition kept from the meetings of that committee.

Mr. ALLISON. If that be true it will have great weight with me, I assure the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Texas.

Mr. MAXEY. I did not hear the question.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to know if the Post-Office Committee have had this question under consideration?

Mr. MAXEY. Very often.

Mr. ALLISON. And if after examining it they have come to the conclusion that it is not wise to adopt the double card?

Mr. MAXEY. I think the best answer I can give is that we have never reported a bill in favor of it, and we have had quite a number before us.

Mr. EATON. Neither my friend from Texas nor my friend from Maine has given a single reason why there is any objection to the double card; and yet both have said that it would not be of any advantage to the Government. Both have signally failed in giving a single reason for that opinion. Here is a penny postal card; a very thin piece of paper, not weighing one-eighth of the single postal card, is added to it, and the man who pastes that gives the Government two cents; and yet my friends say it would be of no advantage to the Government. If the postal card comes back, then the Government has not done double service, for it is not double the weight of the single card. That is my reason for saying this will be of advantage to the Government. I should like to know what reason there is that makes my friend from Texas imagine it would be a disadvantage.

Mr. HAMLIN. I said a moment since that when it should be in order for the Senator from Texas to move the amendment which he had indicated I would state what was my view upon the subject, and I rather chose to do it then because it would be pertinent; but I am not sure that anything in this body is in order that is not out of order. I am not sure that it is proper or appropriate to discuss a question before this body when it is really before it, but you must discuss it when something else is before it. That was the reason which led me to say that I would state the objections which I had when it was more appropriate to state them; but as my friend from Connecticut wants them now, and as I believe it will be more in order to be out of order, I will state them now.

There was an old-fashioned notion prevailing in this country once—it has not so many advocates now as it had among our fathers—that the Post-Office Department, being different from all the other departments of the Government, should at least approximate toward a self-sustaining position. If Senators will look at the results within the last few years they will see that while we have largely extended postal facilities of every kind we have gradually approached that position. Last year I think the Senator who has this bill in charge told us that the deficiencies were between four and five million dollars. This year the deficiencies are a little more than two million.

Our mails are carried by weight. We charge three cents a half ounce to persons who wish to communicate by letter; but to the person who wishes to make an open communication, brief, short, but important to him, we have provided a single postal card. I wish to communicate with my friend in another State by the use of that card. I do so; and he answers upon another card, thereby securing to the Government two cents of postage upon the card. If you send the double card, which is to cost a half more than the single card, you have got to deduct whatever the difference in cost between the two is from the receipts that you derive from the return card. It would cost the Government to manufacture the double card 50 per cent. more than it costs to manufacture the single card. On the question of weight the single postal card is made remunerative in this way, as double return postal cards would not be: they are used as an advertising medium by the thousand if not by the million in the immediate vicinity, and there is no transportation by the Government. They are used in uncounted numbers—we all get them—with printed advertisements upon them from every part; but those advertisements are usually confined largely to the locality. The Government gets the benefit of the postage on the one-cent card, upon which these printed advertisements are made, without being compelled to transport it from Maine to South Carolina or from Maine to California. The great amount of revenue which is derived from the single postal card is derived from that limited circulation. Those which go farthest will, I think, come within the three-cent rule of letters; or, in other words, three of them as they are printed would not exceed in weight the half-ounce; and we do not, therefore, under the single postal cards, pay any more transportation in weight upon three than we pay upon the half-ounce letter. That would be perfectly accurate if all letters weighed half an ounce, but they do not. Many of them weigh a very little more than a single postal card. If you open up a communication which shall be only for written communications, not for advertising, you establish a rate of postage for those who use them in conflict with those who use the letter communication, and establish two rates, and you diminish the revenues upon letter postage to an extent which, in my judgment, would seriously decrease the revenues of your Department, and thereby diminish the facilities that the Department should extend to every part of the country.

I do not suppose I have satisfied my friend, but I have stated to him the reason which will control me in my vote upon this subject. I think the return postal card is wrong in its beginning, wrong as it goes along, and wrong in all its relations. It ought never to have been established, and I should be glad to see it abolished.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MAXEY. I now move the amendment I mentioned, if it is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The paragraph contains two amendments proposed by the Committee on Appropriations. One of them has been adopted; but if no objection be made, as the amendment of the Senator from Texas requires a change in both, the Chair will entertain the amendment, and treat the amendment in line 166 as not having been agreed to. The Chair hears no objection to that course being pursued.

Mr. MAXEY. After the word "single," in line 166, I move to strike out the words "and return;" after the word "number," in line 168, to strike out the words "of each;" and after the word "manufactured," in line 169, to strike out the words "and the cost of said return cards shall not exceed 25 per cent. in addition to the cost of the same number of single cards;" so as to read:

For manufacture of single postal cards, $296,000; and the Postmaster-General shall fix the kind and number of the same to be manufactured.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let me suggest to my friend from Texas if it would not be better to strike out all the words in italics and take the bill precisely as it came from the House.

Mr. MAXEY. I have no objection to modifying my amendment as suggested by the Senator from Maine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That result would be accomplished by simply rejecting the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is it.

Mr. MAXEY. My reply to the Senator from Connecticut has been so admirably made by the Senator from Maine that I do not think it is necessary to add anything to it, only to say that, as is known to him, myself, and every member of the Post-Office Committee, devices for double-headed postal cards, and double-headed envelopes by wholesale have been placed before us, and we never have regarded any one of them as practical. For a thorough business man any of them might do, but for the great body of the people it is utterly impracticable in my judgment. Therefore it was that we failed to report any bill in favor of the proposal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WALLACE. This amendment was considered in the Committee on Appropriations briefly, and we thought, having one of the officers of the Department before us, that good could be accomplished by it. I confess I am somewhat surprised to find that the subject-matter has been under consideration before in the Post-Office Committee of this body.

Mr. HAMLIN. Frequently.

Mr. WALLACE. Of course that committee have more entirely within their control subjects of this character than the Committee on Appropriations, and what they say has very great weight with me as it ought to have with the Senate. Of course I submit to what action the Senate may see fit to take in regard to the amendment.

Mr. BECK. I sent for the act making appropriations for the postal service for the current year, to see what had been done in regard to these matters. It has just been handed to me now as I have risen. I thought I could lay my hands upon it by looking at the law for the current year. It was my impression that some action had been taken in regard to double postal cards. Does the honorable chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads remember whether that was so or not?

Mr. MAXEY. I do not hear the Senator.

Mr. BECK. I thought that on the appropriation act for the current fiscal year some action had been taken in regard to the subject of postal cards.

Mr. MAXEY. There was a year or two ago. I do not remember the exact amount which was appropriated. It was placed in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, according to my recollection, but there has been no action under it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I remember that the law authorized the use of double postal cards, provided that there should be no royalty claimed by any person, and the Postmaster-General has been inhibited by that provision from using double postal cards because there are none except what are patented. An effort has been made before the Post-Office Committee to get a repeal of that provision and a general law on that subject. That is the shape in which the matter stands.

Mr. BECK. Being unable to lay my hand on the law I have nothing to say except that I agree with the Senator from Pennsylvania that the action of the Post-Office Committee has very great weight with me in regard to the money part of the provision.

Mr. TELLER. What is the pending question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the question again. The Senator from Texas originaly moved an amendment to strike out so much of the committee's amendment as provided for return cards. It was then suggested by the Senator from Maine that the object of the Senator from Texas would be accomplished by the simple rejection of the committee's amendment. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was rejected.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill, and read to the end of the first section.

Mr. PUGH. If this be the proper time, I desire to offer an amendment to come in at the end of the first section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the proper time will be immediately after the disposition of the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations. There is but one more amendment of the committee.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in section 2, line 3, after the word "million," to strike out "five" and insert "three hundred and two;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That if the revenue of the Post-Office Department shall be insufficient to meet the appropriations made by this act, then the sum of $2,302,258, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply deficiencies in the revenue of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1882.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PUGH. I offer an amendment from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to come in at the end of section 1.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, at the end of line 197, to add the following:

For additional postal service to foreign countries, $1,000,000, to be expended under the direction of the Postmaster-General, in the establishment of mail steamship lines, equitably distributed among the Atlantic, Mexican, Gulf, and Pacific ports: Provided, That the vessels employed for such service shall be owned and manned by American citizens, and that said vessels thus employed shall be iron steamships, accepted by the Secretary of the Navy, after due inspection, as in all respects seaworthy and properly fitted to such service.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I make the point of order.

Mr. WALLACE. The point of order is made on this amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I submit that it is not in order.

Mr. PUGH. Will the Senator do me the favor to withhold the point of order so that I may address the Senate upon the subject?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly, with pleasure, if the point of order be reserved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is reserved.

Mr. WALLACE. The committee reserve all points of order upon this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, I should not undertake to consume the valuable time of the Senate in addressing it upon this amendment were I not impressed with the fact that I cannot render a more valuable service to the people of Alabama, whom I in part represent, and in fact to the people of the South, than to give in the form that I have them the figures, the reflections, and the views upon this great subject, to which they have paid no attention and about which they are uninformed, and I make that apology for trespassing upon the courtesy of the Senate.

Mr. President, the amendment reported by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to the bill (H. R. No. 6972) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department is intentionally left incomplete in some important provisions, about which each member of the committee is free to act in accordance with his convictions when the amendment is before the Senate. The main purpose of the committee was to introduce to the Senate for its consideration and action a subject of pressing and paramount importance—a great American question affecting the present and future welfare of every class and condition in each of the United States. Congress is confronted by the undisputed facts in the Report of the Bureau of Statistics on the Foreign Commerce of the United States that "the total value of the foreign commerce of the United States, embracing both imports and exports, amounted last year to $1,613,770,633, and was larger than during any previous year in the history of the country;" that "during the five years ending June 30, 1876, 1877, 1878, 1879, and 1880, the value of our exports of domestic merchandise from the United States has greatly exceeded the value of imports of foreign merchandise into the United States, this excess amounting in the five years to the sum of $825,400,513;" that "the value of the exports during the last fiscal year exceeded the value of such exports during the preceding fiscal year $125,199,217, an increase of over 17 per cent;" that "the value of the imports during the last fiscal year exceeded the value of such imports during the preceding fiscal year $222,176,971, an increase of over 49 per cent;" that "the rapid increase in the value of the exports from 1860 to 1880 is shown by the fact that the specie value of such exports during the year ended June 30, 1870, amounted to only $376,616,473, whereas during the year ended June 30, 1880, it amounted to $823,946,353, or an increase of 119 per cent." When we survey the almost boundless extent of American territory, exceeding as it does the whole of Europe surrounded as it is by two oceans, the gulf, and the lakes, with an ocean front equal to all other nations combined, and 90,000 miles of splendid railways, and capabilities, opportunities, probabilities, and possibilities for agricultural, commercial, mechanical, mineral, and manufacturing production and development, we are bewildered by the grand spectacle, and rejoice that we are Americans. Great Britain, France, and Germany, the lions of Europe, have culminated in their internal food-producing capacity and found themselves largely dependent upon American surplus for support of their dense populations. The only self-supporting, attractive resource left for their capital, genius, and enterprise is found in manufacturing and mining at home and in their commerce with foreign nations. The total foreign commerce of the United States with Great Britain during last year was $664,410,191; with France it was $169,407,456; with Germany, $109,407,456.

The internal food-producing capacity of the United States is out of the reach of computation. Our boundless fields, in full view of American capital, genius, and enterprise, have attracted and absorbed them, and profitable investment and employment therein have wholly diverted all the agencies of improvement and progress from foreign fields and engaged them in home development. And we find ourselves amazed and confounded by our rapid growth and sudden dimensions. And yet we are in our infancy, and just approaching the untouched and inexhaustible realities and advantages of our situation.

Let us call a halt and look around, and see what is going on between us and our foreign neighbors.

In 1860 we imported in American vessels $228,164,855, and exported same year in American vessels $279,082,902. During the same year we imported in foreign vessels $134,001,399, and exported $121,039,394, making in the aggregate of imports and exports during the year 1860, in American vessels, $507,247,757; and in foreign vessels $255,049,793, over 66 per cent. in favor of American vessels.

In 1880 our imports in American vessels amounted to $164,087,606, and in foreign vessels to $579,394,159. The same year our exports in American vessels amounted to $115,917,891, and in foreign vessels to $730,072,437, a falling off from American vessels to about 17 from over 66 per cent. in twenty years.

This startling loss of the ocean carrying trade of the United States with foreign countries works an annual drainage in coin from American income of about one hundred and thirty millions per annum, paid by Americans to foreign ship-owners for freight and passengers.

The causes that produced this remarkable result have been the subject of much speculative inquiry. We find that the United States was the master in ship-building and in the foreign carrying trade when vessels were made of wood and moved by wind and sail; but now, when ships are built of iron and propelled by steam, their superiority in every particular has given them the sway, and England, getting the start and devoting her energy and capital to the building of iron steamships and employing them in the foreign carrying trade, while we were engaged and absorbed in home production, development, and enterprise, has established her supremacy upon the ocean.

We have not only lost our carrying trade, and are humiliated by the fact that we have not a single iron ship carrying our flag across the ocean, but American sailors, once the pride and boast of the whole country, have disappeared, and to-day we are in the humiliating position of being powerless for naval warfare or the protection of our vitals exposed upon our sea-coast to foreign attack.

Every American is deeply interested, and should feel the paramount importance of providing, as early as practicable, all the means in our power for restoring to American ship-owners our export and import carrying trade with foreign countries. Every State in our Union and every interest and pursuit suffer materially by the annual payment by citizens of the United States to foreign ship-owners of $130,000,000. This amount of gold is exported annually and goes out of American pockets into the pockets of foreigners. How can we continue to submit to such an enormous annual absorption of American income without serious detriment to our prosperity, on account of the loss of our supply of currency and the consequent derangement of our trade and commerce?

How can we accept the condition of perilous dependence upon perpetual peace with our own nation, and between nations that afford the only market for our vast and yearly increasing surplus productions? It becomes the present and pressing duty of Congress to exercise all its power in removing the obstructions and incumbrances and inequalities that are believed to be in the way, and providing all the aids necessary and proper in the great work of restoring our merchant marine, and of saving to Americans the money of Americans, for American carrying trade with foreign countries.

The difficult question is, What is the best and surest and speediest remedy? How far can Senators agree? It cannot be denied that we must have ships enough to accommodate the trade. How shall the indispensable necessity for a sufficient number of ships be supplied? To my mind it is self-evident that the only way to supply the necessary number of ships, or any number of ships, is to make it safe and profitable for men to become ship-owners. Without ship-owners you can have no ship-builders. The inducement to become ship-owners must first exist before there can be any hope of having or employing ship-builders. What will induce Americans to invest their capital in iron steamships and running them as carriers of freight and passengers to and from American to foreign ports? Nothing but reasonable certainty that the investment will be free from legislative impositions and exactions, and profitable. How can these two indispensable predicates to ship-owning by citizens of the United States be supplied?

Ship owning is by companies or corporations and not by individuals. The amount of money required to build an iron steamship of average tonnage is about three hundred thousand dollars, and only associated capital seeks such investment. An American company finds the ocean free to all carriers, with no power in the Government to protect the company against the competition and rivalry of the ships of other nations for the carrying trade. It finds the iron ships of England in possession of nearly 70 per cent. of the foreign carrying trade of this country; that the tonnage of English ships is taxed only 1 per cent. upon the net income of the ship; that to ascertain the tonnage of an English ship only the space occupied by the cargo is measured; that the cost of the English ship is about one-fourth less than an American-built ship, and that some English lines of ships are carrying the mails at an annual compensation of about three million and two hundred thousand dollars. This American company, like all Americans, is anxious to spend its capital in our own country, for ships built here by our own mechanics and workingmen, out of American material, and to run them under the American flag. But, on examination they find that the cost of building the ship in an American ship-yard, by better fed and better paid American mechanics and workingmen, and the higher priced material makes the cost of the American-built ship one-fourth more than the English ship. It is also found that the annual tax on the tonnage of an American built and owned ship is thirty cents a ton, whether it is running or tied up in the dock, and that the whole ship is measured without any allowance of space for machinery or otherwise.

Besides, the State and city tax levied on American built and owned ships, like other property, is in New York 2½ per cent. on the value of the ship, and more or less in other States.

Is it not manifest that the difference in the original cost, and in English and American taxation, and the other differences mentioned have and will always destroy the inducement to become American ship-owners and the hope of successful competition and profitable running of ships built in America, registered, and carrying the American flag, in our foreign trade, under existing navigation laws? It is unreasonable to hope for any change in our favor until ship-owners who are citizens of the United States are placed upon terms of equality in the cost, ownership, and running of their vessels with those other ship-owners with whom they must compete upon the ocean.

There is a wide difference of opinion as to the ability of American ship-builders to construct iron steamers in American ship-yards at the same cost of such vessels built on the Clyde. Mr. John Roach, the greatest American ship-builder, and a man of acknowledged capacity and skill in that business, stated in an elaborate speech before the national convention of ship-owners and ship-builders at Boston in October last, that the difference in the cost of building iron steamers in American ship-yards and on the Clyde was only 10 per cent. Why, then, is it true that during the year ending June 30, 1879, but 193,031 tons were built, including all the schooners, sloops, canal-boats, and barges, and that less than one hundred thousand tons were suitable for foreign trade? Why is it that prior to the introduction of iron steamers, when vessels were built of wood, American ship-builders and owners excelled the world in supplying ships for the foreign carrying trade? The American supply of material for the construction of iron steamers is as abundant as it is in England, and it must be the absence of a demand for American-built iron ships by those who have the capital to invest in ship-building for the foreign carrying trade, that is the sole cause of the idleness of our ship-builders and the surrender of the foreign carrying trade to English and other foreign vessels. Why is there no demand for American-built iron steamers? Mr. Roach, in the same speech from which I have quoted, furnishes the answer. He says:

> The truth is, that taxation on the ship, high rate of interest, and the difficulty of concentrating capital in this country, are at the root of the evil in this matter. Taxation is what has compelled American merchants to sell their ships and put them under a foreign flag. Steamship business is done by large companies, and when you start a company the taxation is too great to be borne. English capitalists readily invest their money in ship operations under the English laws, but they naturally hesitate about risking it under the practically prohibitory shipping-taxation laws of this country. "Put the difference in annual taxation," which continues during the whole life of the ship, beside the difference of 10 per cent. in the cost of construction of American ships built in this country, and say which is the more likely to prevent our merchants from owning ships. It would seem to be enough that the interest on American capital should be 6 per cent. while in England it is only 3, without adding such a tax. Beside, the ship carrying the English flag is not compelled to carry the mail unless it sees proper to do so, and getting for its service fair compensation, while the American ship is compelled to carry it for merely the letter postage. But this is not all. The American ship is more costly to build, because 90 per cent. of the cost of construction is labor, and American labor is dearer than European labor. But so is the American labor required to run the ship dearer. In fact, the labor required in building is only a drop in the bucket. The number of days' labor required to man a 3,000-ton iron steamship for two years is about equal to the number of days' labor to build her, while the life of such a ship of the first class is twenty-five years; therefore, there are more than twelve times more labor required in the running than in the building of the ship. It is the plan of deceit to put forward the little fact that we cannot build, and try to conceal the big fact that we cannot run ships when we have them, unless the barriers of taxation, &c., which I have mentioned, are removed, and an American policy adopted equally as favorable to the building up of a commercial marine as the policy adopted by other nations.

I have thus quoted at length from the speech of the greatest and most experienced ship-builder, Mr. John Roach, and I fully indorse what I have quoted as to the effect of taxation and the other burdens and inequalities created by navigation laws. It is proper for me to mention that in making labor 90 per cent. of the cost of constructing an iron steamship, Mr. Roach estimates the cost of the labor employed in appropriating all the raw material in its natural condition and working it into the material and putting together the perfect ship. It is estimated that the cost of the labor in putting the ship together, having the material in shape of angle-iron, plates, &c., already prepared, is in England about 27 per cent. of the total cost. Mr. Boynton, of New York, who is well informed upon the subject of ship-building, about which he addressed the Boston convention, stated that "the total expenditure for the 100,000 tons of vessels suited to our foreign trade, and built in American ship-yards in the year 1879, would not exceed $10,000,000, and the earnings per annum would be from one and a half to two million dollars." That "this is the total amount of benefit to our country, and its distribution among the workmen that built it, and the seamen that man it, will promote their welfare;" but how much are the shippers and producers of America benefited thereby; and how much have they been injured by having to submit to the annual payment to foreigners of $130,000,000, for ocean transportation, Americans are compelled to purchase, and from supplying which American ship-owners are in effect prohibited by the burdens, prohibitions, and discriminations of American legislation?

The honorable and justly distinguished Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] made a speech last year at the dinner of the New York Chamber of Commerce, from which I make the following quotation:

> In 1856–'7, Great Britain, the leading commercial nation of the world, had only 950,000 tons engaged in trade between the United States and that kingdom. She has 5,200,000 tons now. Germany then had but 166,000 tons; this last year she had 950,000 tons. Norway and Sweden twenty years ago had in trade between this country and their own but 20,000 tons. Last year's reports show that they had 850,000 tons. Even Austria, penned up with a limited seaboard as she is, had in commerce with us twenty years ago not a vessel of her own, but last year she had no less than 220,000 tons. And I might go on thus through the whole list. In this mighty decrease of our tonnage from 4,400,000 to 600,000 tons in about eleven years, the United States has gone backward, and all the vast profit of this trade has gone into the coffers of other nations. Let me ask of you here what other interests have gone backward in that period? Has industry? Why it has outstripped imagination. Has agriculture or internal commerce languished? Why we have increased from 30,000 to 68,000 miles of railroads, and the United States has given to aid commerce over two hundred million acres of the public domain. But mean time she has protected by tariff every article that the American would manufacture. For the foreign commerce of the country, though, what has been done? It has been left to the alien and the stranger; and in the last ten years the value of the products carried between this country and foreign countries has exceeded $11,000,000,000 a year, out of the carrying of which somebody has made $110,000,000 per annum, a sum far larger than the interest upon the public debt. And who has made this money? France, England, Germany—everybody excepting the United States. Think of it, $110,000,000 in gold coin has gone out of the commerce of this country into the commerce of other countries. Can New York stand this? Can this great port sustain such a loss as this, with all her unbounded advantages of position and of resources, and with the magnificent continental commerce that stands behind her? I say, gentlemen, that if the carrying trade of this country, aggregating $110,000,000, is permanently turned from us, then the question of specie payments becomes one of far more complicated difficulty than it is to-day, and the only way to make that question easier of solution is to turn that current of gold from those coffers into our own.

This is an imposing, faithful, and humiliating picture of the present condition of the means of carrying our exports and imports across the ocean. The question recurs, what is the remedy?

1. Provide by law that "all materials for the construction, equipment, or repair of vessels of the United States may be imported in bond, and withdrawn therefrom under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury; and upon proof that such materials have been used for such purpose, no duties shall be paid thereon. And all vessels owned wholly by citizens of the United States shall be entitled to registry, enrollment, and license, and to all the benefits and privileges of vessels of the United States."

2. "That as property invested in shipping derives its protection from the Government of the United States, and as such property is subject to Federal taxation, it should be exempt from all local and municipal taxation by special act of Congress, leaving the net income only subject to such taxation."

3. Repeal of the law levying a duty upon tonnage.

4. Change of the navigation laws, so as to allow any citizen, company, or corporation of the United States to purchase iron steamships wherever they can be built or purchased the cheapest, with the right to register, enroll, and license, and sail them under the American flag, the same as if they were constructed in an American ship-yard.

5. That iron steamships so purchased and owned, and registered, licensed, and enrolled shall be engaged by contract with the Government to carry the mails of the United States to foreign countries, and allowed for such service reasonable compensation.

All that can be expected from this Congress is an appropriation of $1,000,000 to be expended by the Postmaster-General in increasing and improving the mail facilities of the United States with such foreign countries as he may select, having reference to the increase and improvement of our commerce and carrying trade with such countries. Shall the appropriation be made? It is opposed by some Senators because we can compel the carrying of mails under existing laws for the postage, which, I am informed, amounts annually, for our entire foreign mail carrying, to about two hundred thousand dollars. And it is insisted that all over the present compensation would be naked subsidy.

We might have saved millions paid annually to railroads for overland mail service if such service had been required free of charge as one of the conditions of our land grants and other Government aid to railroads. But no such right was reserved and we are now paying millions to railroad corporations made rich and powerful by the bounty of the Government. We have shown no such liberality to our ship-owners, but after burdening them with taxation, and allowing no freedom in the race with rival foreign nations for the ocean carrying trade of our own country we compel them to carry the mails for a mere trifle when compared with the millions paid railroads for similar service. And it is not unreasonable to estimate that when American ship-owners establish the several lines of free ships between the important ports of this and foreign countries anticipated by the proposed amendment, that the increase of our trade and commerce will so enlarge our mail necessities and facilities that the amount appropriated will not exceed just compensation for the service.

Other Senators oppose the appropriation because it is not to be expended for carrying our foreign mails on American-built ships, owned, manned, registered, and run according to our naviagation laws. In other words, it is insisted that we shall continue an experiment that is already an established failure, of competing upon a free ocean against free ships purchased at far less cost, and running comparatively free from taxation or other incumbrances or restrictions carried by American-built steamers. How has Germany within the last decade increased her tonnage from 166,000 tons to 950,000 tons? How have Norway and Sweden within the last twenty years increased their tonnage from 20,000 to 850,000 tons? How has Austria, with her limited seaboard, grown from no ship to 220,000 tons? The answer is plain and simple and undeniable that each of these countries have permitted their citizens to go into the markets of the world, on the Clyde or elsewhere, and purchase ships where they can make the best bargains, and when so purchased they are unloaded of burdensome taxation and prohibitory restrictions, and entered into a free fight in an open field. If Germans and Swedes and Norwegians and Austrians can succeed in the struggle for the ocean carrying trade, why cannot Americans? When and where was American genius, skill, and enterprise unequal to any demand or emergency when left to an open field and a fair fight? But it is suggested that other countries pay their ship-owners liberal compensation for carrying their mails to foreign ports. Not one in a hundred of English ships have any mail contracts whatever. Neither do the lines having the advantage of mail contracts monopolize transportation on account of their ability to carry freight at cheaper rates. But I am willing to favor liberal compensation for ocean mail service, and place it on terms of equality with our overland mail service by railroads. I doubt very much whether compensation for mail service, however liberal, will produce any largely beneficial results. I have no idea such inconsiderable aid would enable merchants and capitalists who wish to engage in our ocean carrying trade with other countries to compete with the cheaper built and comparatively untaxed and unencumbered ships of England. As John Roach says, we must go to the root of the evil, and in my poor judgment the only way to do so is to legislate as I have proposed. But all we can do now is to vote the appropriation to ships owned exclusively by citizens of the United States, wherever purchased, and try the experiment.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to state that, as a member of the Post-Office Committee, I did not concur in the amendment now offered to this bill from that committee. I dissent entirely from the provisions of that amendment and desire it to be understood that while that amendment has been reported from that committee it did not meet the concurrence of the whole committee. As one member of that committee, I am utterly opposed to the measure.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I do not propose to discuss this question on the point of order as to reception of the amendment, but I simply rise to say that, as a member of the Post-Office Committee, I did not give my consent to the introduction of this amendment. I am opposed to the whole spirit of the amendment and to every effort to restore the carrying trade of the United States by subsidies. I do not conceive that we shall in that way reach the source of this great evil or that we can restore the carrying trade of the United States by any such measure.

I only rose to give notice that I did not concur in the amendment in committee.

Mr. GROOME. Mr. President, I simply wish to make for myself the statement which has already been made by the Senator from Delaware in his behalf, and by the Senator from Tennessee in his, that I do not concur with the majority of the committee in regard to this amendment. I shall not enter into any discussion of it now.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, this report was made like all other reports are made; it is the report of a majority of the committee. It being a majority report, it is the report of the committee. Those three Senators were opposed to the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The Senator from Texas refers to the pending amendment which was reported from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. MAXEY. Yes, sir; it is reported from that committee by a majority, and the report of a majority is the report of the committee. The Senators who have stated their dissent were opposed to it.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, I do not care to enter into a discussion of the merits of this question further than to say that I am in entire sympathy with the proposition contained in the amendment. The only objection I have to it is that it does not include all that it should. The masterly presentation of the case to which we have just listened from the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] relieves me of the necessity of saying anything at all in favor of the amendment if it was properly before the Senate. I could not add anything to what he has already so ably said; and I am perfectly willing to let the argument of the question rest upon his speech on that side. I simply point to the speech as the man did who had a prayer copied at the head of his bed, so as to save time, simply saying when he went to bed, "Lord, those are my sentiments."

But I rose to address the Senate upon the question of order that was made or reserved to this proposition by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair is not aware of the fact that a question of order is pending.

Mr. WHYTE. Oh, yes; it was raised both by the representative of the Committee on Appropriations and the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair was not then in the chair. The question of order, then, is made and simply reserved pending the discussion.

Mr. WHYTE. It was waived temporarily to enable the Senator from Alabama to deliver his views.

Mr. GARLAND. And upon that question now or whenever it is proper for me to do so, I wish to make some remarks to the Senate.

Mr. WALLACE. I make the point of order against this amendment that it has never been before the Committee on Appropriations, that this bill was reported to the Senate on the 2d of February, and that the amendment was referred to the committee on the 7th instant, and therefore it does not come within the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not hesitate to decide that even though this amendment is recommended by a standing committee, if it has never been referred to the Committee on Appropriations it does not come within the rule, and the amendment is not in order.

Mr. GARLAND. It has been referred, as the record shows.

Mr. WALLACE. It has been referred. I do not make that point The point I make is that the bill was reported on the 2d of February to the Senate, that this amendment was referred by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to the Committee on Appropriations on the 7th, five days after the bill was in the custody of the Senate.

Mr. GARLAND. That is the statement of the case. The twenty-eighth rule of the Senate requires that before amendments of this kind can be entertained, they shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations one day before they are offered. The Senator from Pennsylvania, representing the Committee on Appropriations, makes the report of the Post-Office appropriation bill on the 2d of February. That bill was here on the table printed in due time. The Senator from Texas, representing the Post-Office Committee, offers this amendment as recommended by the Post-Office Committee, and it is referred to the Committee on Appropriations on the 7th. That was three days ago. It was actually referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and if the committee did not consider it, that is the business of the committee and not the business of the Senator who offered it or of the Senate.

The Senator from Texas representing the Post-Office Committee could not offer it in the Senate until the bill came up to which it purported to be an amendment. That bill has not come up and not been called up until to-day. Now what is the object of Rule 28 in that particular? It is that neither the Senate nor any of its committees may be taken by surprise in the offering of an amendment to vote away the money of the country.

Mr. EATON. Do I understand the Senator from Arkansas to say that an amendment cannot be offered to a bill until it has been reported?

Mr. GARLAND. I did not say so.

Mr. EATON. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. GARLAND. I did not say that.

Mr. EATON. An amendment to an appropriation bill can be offered at any time, even before the bill comes from the other House.

Mr. GARLAND. That only strengthens the position I am stating. The object of Rule 28, under which this point of order is raised, is that the Senate and its committees shall not be taken by surprise in reference to voting away the money of the country. Now what is the surprise here? There is none because, pending this bill, on the table of the Senate and printed three days before it is called up, an amendment is offered and referred to the Committee on Appropriations to be considered. Neither the committee nor the Senate can possibly be taken by surprise.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator listen to a suggestion from me?

Mr. GARLAND. I will.

Mr. CONKLING. I am disposed to agree with the Senator, if I can, but I am more troubled upon this point: the object of a rule requiring an amendment to be referred to a committee having the bill in charge must be, beside that stated by the Senator, that the committee may act upon the amendment and may consider it in connection with the bill. When the committee have once reported the bill to the Senate, it is no longer in charge of that committee any more than any other committee. The fact that it was once committed to the committee does not give the committee reporting it any retained hold upon it after it comes into the Senate. Now, if after the committee has finished the bill and reported it to the Senate, an amendment is referred to the committee, how does that satisfy the rule if its object be to enable the committee to act upon that amendment in connection with that bill?

I do not know that I make myself understood by the Senator, but if I do, I beg to hear him on that point.

Mr. GARLAND. I understand the Senator perfectly well, and I was intending to come to that point before I finished. When the Senator from Texas offers his amendment representing the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, it so happens that this bill is out of the Committee on Appropriations. There we come to the practical question whether it was the duty of the Senator from Texas as representing the Post-Office Committee to have moved to recommit the appropriation bill with the amendment, or whether it was the duty of the Committee on Appropriations having in charge this Post-Office appropriation bill to make the statement and ask that the whole subject be again committed to it.

Now, holding in view all the while that it is simply a question of mere matter of surprise, or mere matter of hasty dealing with the public Treasury, according to the letter of Rule 28, the amendment is out of order possibly, but according to its spirit and meaning it is not out of order, because the Senate and its Committee on Appropriations have had every opportunity to consider this matter maturely, and the question practically suggested now by the Senator from New York is simply a matter of duty or failure of duty—I mean it, of course, in no offensive sense—whether it was not the place of the Committee on Appropriations to ask that the bill be recommitted to it, or whether it was the place of the Senator from Texas, representing the Post-Office Committee, to ask that.

Then we are brought simply on this question of order to this mere matter of lapsus, on account of which no Senator can say truthfully that he is surprised or that he has been hastened into the consideration of the subject at all; and in view of the lateness of the session and in view of the difficulty of getting at this question, which is so important and has been so well represented by the Senator from Alabama, I hope that the Senate will vote that this amendment is in order, and I think within the spirit and meaning of the rule, it is in order.

Mr. BAYARD. I would suggest to my friend from Arkansas upon the theory that the committees of the Senate are organized for investigation and to inform the Senate, the rule requiring that amendments to a general appropriation bill shall be submitted to the Committee on Appropriations for the purpose of having their examination, ascertainment, and report, how idle it would be to send a measure to the committee when the committee had discharged itself from the consideration of the bill, having reported the bill back to the Senate. The Committee on Appropriations acts as a body, consults as a body, votes as a body, and reports as a body; but the amendment in question never was before them as a body; they never reported it; and therefore if it be the object of the Senate under Rule 28 to procure advisory action of the committee, whose consultations are to be reported, the object has entirely failed, by not having the amendment submitted to it in time, which means, of course, before the committee reports the bill.

If the amendment had been sent to the committee on the very day of the report of the bill, it would have been too late. The rule requires twenty-four hours, which means twenty-four clear hours for the examination in order that the advice of that committee as an organized body shall reach the Senate. In this case it was impossible. The committee had reported the bill, and as I said had been self-discharged from the further consideration of the subject by reporting the result of their deliberations. Now, can it be that the rule is satisfied either in letter or in spirit, by referring an amendment to them, after relieving them of the subject, after the bill upon which the amendment was to be ingrafted had passed out of their hands?

Mr. GARLAND. In response to the statement the Senator from Delaware makes, let me say that Rule 28 does not require the amendment to be offered a day before the Committee on Appropriations reports. That is not the language of the rule. It requires the amendment to be referred a day at least before it is offered in the Senate. That is the rule; I quote the language exactly, "shall at least one day before they are offered." Offered where? Offered in the Senate, as a matter of course. Now, this amendment is offered by the Senator from Alabama the very first opportunity he has had to offer it. The bill has come from the committee, it is true, yet the committee is not discharged from it, according to the Senator from Delaware. They are not discharged yet. We are proceeding to see whether we will discharge them from the further consideration by adopting the bill or by sending it back to them.

The object, the sole object, of a reference to the Committee on Appropriations is for them to ascertain simply whether the Government can stand the appropriation; and when in their judgment the Treasury can stand the appropriation, that is all the rule requires them to have an opportunity of knowing. We can even yet recommit this bill with all the amendments.

I contend in the parliamentary view that notwithstanding this bill managed by the Senator from Pennsylvania, representing the Committee on Appropriations, was upon the table here, yet when this distinct subject went before them under the amendment submitted by the Senator from Texas, they had this whole subject before them, and it did not require the original bill to go back to them to give them jurisdiction of it. They could have come and reported this as an independent proposition, if they saw proper, or reported it as an amendment to a bill they had already reported. There can be no mistake about that in the view of parliamentary law.

If it is obnoxious to Rule 28, it is, as I think my friend from Pennsylvania will confess, by reason of a bare technicality that makes it so, for the Senate and the committee have had every opportunity to consider this proposition, which stands out here in importance second to none that we have had before the Senate during this session of Congress.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to make an inquiry of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania or the honorable Senator from Arkansas. Has the Committee on Appropriations taken any action whatever on this amendment?

Mr. WALLACE. They have not. The Senator from Texas, the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, informed me of his desire to submit this amendment to the Committee on Appropriations. The committee was in session, and I think it was the day after he first gave me notice, before this was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. It was never acted on by the Committee on Appropriations at all. The bill had been reported to the Senate before the amendment was offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads if this amendment was reported from that committee as an amendment to be offered to this appropriation bill?

Mr. MAXEY. I answer the question by reading from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 8 a portion of the proceedings of the day before, as follows:

> Mr. MAXEY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 6972) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Personal notice of which I gave to the Senator in charge of the bill.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. There is one idea which seems to be taken for granted by some gentlemen here that I confess I do not comprehend. It is that standing committees of this body cannot consider an amendment to a bill unless the bill itself is at the time before the committee. I do not understand that. Where do gentlemen get that idea?

Mr. EATON. Will my friend pardon me a moment?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. EATON. Look at the action of the Senate on all bills. Within the last thirty days there have been more than one hundred amendments offered, more than one hundred memorials and petitions presented with regard to bills which have been reported from the various committees, and when they were offered they were laid upon the table because those bills had been reported and thoroughly considered by the committees.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I cannot comprehend yet why under Rule 28 the standing Committee on Appropriations cannot consider the question of a specific appropriation proposed by an amendment, simply because the general appropriation bill to which that amendment is to be attached is not before them. I cannot understand it. The whole object of Rule 28 is to secure the consideration by the Committee on Appropriations of a proposed amendment, and that they may give consideration to that amendment they must have it twenty-four hours before it is acted on in the Senate. Now, do you say that an amendment cannot be referred to that committee because the committee has reported the general bill to which the amendment applies? It is no answer to say that it may have been so acted on. I think I know cases where the reverse is true, but still in the nature of the subject why is it that a standing committee of this body cannot consider an amendment proposing a specific appropriation because the general subject has already been reported upon? Are they not familiar with the bill that has been reported? Are they not familiar with the whole subject? Does not the very fact that they have already reported that bill show that they are familiar with it?

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to make a suggestion at that precise point of his argument in confirmation of it? The very rule implies that amendments are first to be referred to committees that have not got the bill in their possession at all. An amendment to a general appropriation bill is referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, if it relates to that subject, although the Post-Office appropriation bill never goes to them. The rule itself implies that they may report a specific amendment to a bill that is in the possession of another committee or that is in the possession of the Senate. If they may do that, a fortiori may not the very committee that had the bill in its possession all the time have an amendment referred to it?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Certainly, I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts; and besides, if Senators will reflect a moment, the necessity of referring an amendment or making an amendment to the bill may not occur to Senators until the committee has reported it. The bill if not reported may when reported contain the very provision wanted, and save the necessity of referring the amendment. When this bill is reported, if a Senator finds that a provision which he desires incorporated in it has not been made, do you say that because the committee have reported the general bill they have got rid of the whole subject, and, therefore, the Senate is incapable of considering it? By no means. The whole object of the rule is to procure consideration to the subject by a committee familiar with it, and they can consider it just as well, just as thoroughly after they have reported the bill as before, and the necessity for making the amendment may be all the more apparent after the bill has been reported.

For my life I cannot see anything in these rules that prevents the consideration of an amendment which has been referred to the committee twenty-four hours in advance of its being offered in the Senate. It is proposed and offered, and then when it comes up in the Senate it is regularly offered; it has been considered, it has received the deliberate consideration of the standing committee of the Senate. Gentlemen seem to have an idea that a standing committee of the Senate cannot consider a branch of a subject unless the whole subject is before them. You have a standing Committee on Appropriations. It is always the duty of that committee to consider any question of appropriations, either general or specific, that the Senate may refer to them.

Mr. MORRILL. May I ask the Senator from Georgia if it has not come under his notice—it certainly has come under mine—that the Committee on Appropriations have frequently come in with many amendments to bills that have already been reported?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Certainly. I said in reply to my friend from Connecticut that even if the precedent was the other way it would not satisfy me. I agree with the Senator from Vermont; I think I have observed very often, and indeed I remember now myself to have offered amendments and had them referred to the Committee on Appropriations after that committee had reported the bill. I did not see the necessity of the amendments until after they had reported the bill; it was not brought to my attention; and I then had the amendments referred to the Committee on Appropriations. I can see nothing in the world to prevent them from considering the subject simply because they have reported the bill.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, this is the first time in my life that I have ever heard that after a committee had made its report upon a general appropriation bill that committee could consider amendments subsequently offered and referred to it. I presumed that the old parliamentary proceeding was recognized by everybody that after a committee had made a report of a bill to the House which had sent it to the committee to investigate, as to that particular subject the committee was discharged. It is as old as parliamentary law, and the mere fact that you have a standing committee instead of a select committee to make inquiries for the whole body of the House does not alter the question. It is the very oldest of parliamentary law that after a committee has examined a subject committed to it and reported upon it the committee is dissolved as to that subject, and Jefferson and every parliamentary writer lays it down as the rule of law.

Mr. MORGAN. I will ask the honorable Senator, if he will allow me, whether the Committee on Appropriations could not have got together within the last half hour and have agreed upon this same amendment offered by my colleague and have made it their own when they offered it as an amendment to their bill?

Mr. WHYTE. I do not think so.

Mr. MORGAN. It has been done.

Mr. WHYTE. It may have been done without objection; but the subject-matter must be recommitted to the committee to enable them to consider amendments; and the rule is a rule of reason and of common sense, and if Senators will look at the language of the rule they will see the object of it. The object is to submit to the Committee on Appropriations the amendments while they are discussing the whole appropriation bill. They know the revenue; they know the amount of the resources of the Government, and they know exactly how much can be expended; they know whether the Government can afford to make the expenditure; and while they are considering that question as to the total amount of appropriation, every amendment intended to increase the appropriation bill must go to them. Why? Because that committee has charge of the subject; because that committee is invested with the whole nature of the subject, and because that committee can tell whether the resources of the Government will justify the increase of the appropriation.

Now, why under the rule ought that committee to act before the bill is out of its possession? For the purpose I have stated, that it can ascertain whether it is proper to add that increase of appropriation to the appropriation bill, and must it not investigate it in advance? Certainly. Look at the language of the rule:

> All amendments to general appropriation bills moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, proposing to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add new items of appropriation, shall, at least one day before they are offered, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Is that all? Is it a mere matter of form that they are to be sent to that committee? Is it a matter of red-tape that they must go there before they are offered in the Senate? No; it is for the purpose of obtaining the mind of the Committee on Appropriations on the subject at the time when it is considering the whole matter of inquiry, and therefore, while it goes to that committee, and is acted upon by that committee, what further does the rule say?

> And when actually proposed to the bill.

When it has come back from the committee, when the amendment is reported from the committee, either favorably or otherwise, when that amendment so sent to them shall be—

> Actually proposed to the bill, no amendment proposing to increase the amount stated in such amendment shall be received.

Why not? If it does not amount to anything to go to them, but is a mere matter of form, why can you not make, as in this case, the amount $2,000,000 instead of $1,000,000? It shows that the rule is intended to have the amendment before the committee when they are examining the subject, acted upon then during their examination of the subject, and after their report of the bill is made, the amendment coming back with the bill, favorably or unfavorably, that specific amendment as it goes to them and comes back to the Senate cannot be altered, and the amount cannot be increased.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, it seems to me that the remarks of the honorable Senator from Maryland are made in entire misconception of the policy of the Senate established in its rules relating to this matter. The rules go all through upon the idea that an amendment to a general appropriation bill is in some sense a separate bill; it relates to a large mass of different subjects, different expenditures. The learned Senator argues that when the Appropriations Committee has made its report upon a bill, it is functus officio as to that subject, and it cannot be supposed that it was the purpose of the Senate to permit the commitment of an amendment to a bill to a committee that had reported on the bill itself. Why, Mr. President, the Senator forgets that the very rule he is discussing required and implies the original commitment of the amendment to a committee that has no jurisdiction over the bill whatever. This amendment was properly, in the first place, committed to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. They never were to report the bill itself; they had an amendment, and nothing else before them. Now, does not the honorable Senator from Maryland see that the rule starts, in dealing with the matter of this amendment, on the theory that it is to be treated, for many parliamentary purposes, as if it were a separate bill? Then, having been reported to the Senate as an amendment to a general appropriation bill, by a committee that never had that general appropriation bill within its jurisdiction, but only this particular clause, why should it not be considered by the committee that had the general bill under its jurisdiction?

The rule supposes and implies the expectation of the Senate that these amendments will ordinarily come in after the Senate sees the bill as matured by the committee. It is amendments not contained in the bill or amendments increasing what the bill provides with which the rule deals, implying, therefore, ordinarily that when these amendments are offered, first referred to the appropriate committee, and then referred to the Committee on Appropriations, the Senate will know what the Committee on Appropriations have originally done; otherwise the mover of the amendment cannot know whether he is increasing the items of appropriation or whether he is adding an item not already contained in the bill. Then when the amendment is introduced the rule goes on, as the Senator from Maryland says, to declare that no amendment increasing the amount of that amendment shall be in order; in other words, applying to that amendment (treating it for that purpose as an original bill) the precise provision which the Senate had applied to the original bill as it came from the Committee on Appropriations itself, and guarding the Treasury by prohibiting an increase of the appropriation.

Then the rule goes one step further and says, when this amendment is properly and lawfully moved in the Senate it shall be in order to lay it on the table by itself, and that the adoption of that motion shall not carry the entire bill with it.

So, then, from its origin to its final disposition by an incorporation in the bill, or by a rejection, or by laying upon the table, the rules of the Senate treat an amendment introducing a new subject-matter into a general appropriation bill, a new item, or increasing the proposition of the Committee on Appropriations as to old items, as for that purpose a separate bill, and no reason can be stated why such an amendment should not be referred, if moved after the original appropriation bill has been reported, to the Committee on Appropriations, but on the contrary every reason is in favor of the jurisdiction of that committee.

I do not deal with the question whether this amendment is objectionable under the twenty-ninth rule as general legislation, because that point has not been taken yet.

Mr. BUTLER. I offer the following amendment to the amendment——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question of order will be settled before any amendment can be received to the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. I give notice, then, that I will offer an amendment, after the word "ports" in the fifth line to insert "in proportion to the annual value of the exports from said ports to foreign countries."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the question of order to be that raised by the Senator from Pennsylvania, that this amendment having been referred to the Committee on Appropriations after that committee had reported the bill to which the amendment is proposed, this amendment is for that reason out of order. The Chair holds that this amendment having been reported by one of the standing committees of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Appropriations more than one day prior to the time that it is offered for adoption in the Senate, the amendment is in order under Rule 28, notwithstanding the fact that the bill had been previously reported by the Committee on Appropriations, and overrules the point of order raised by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALLACE. I now make the point of order under Rule 29 that this is general legislation. It seems to me that that must be apparent from the provisions of the amendment. It is:

For additional postal service to foreign countries, $1,000,000, to be expended under the direction of the Postmaster-General—

That far it is a direct matter of appropriations; but then follows—

in the establishment of mail steamship lines—

First there are to be mail steamship lines established by the Postmaster-General. He is authorized by this amendment for the first time to establish mail steamship lines. Second, these mail steamship lines are to be—equitably distributed among the Atlantic, Mexican-Gulf, and Pacific ports.

So that it is legislation which authorizes the Postmaster-General to create mail steamship lines and to distribute them among the Atlantic, Mexican-Gulf, and Pacific ports. I do not mean to deal with the proviso, but simply desire to call the attention of the Senate to two words found in appropriation bills of this character in making appropriation for steamship routes that now exist. The words are:

For inland transportation by steamboat routes, $950,000.

Those are already in existence. Those to which this $1,000,000 is proposed to be appropriated are to be created by the Postmaster-General and of course it becomes legislation.

For inland transportation by star routes.

How do they exist? By virtue of law creating them. They are already in existence. There is no such thing as that in regard to the mail steamship lines which are to be provided under this amendment. Hence we create, we enact, we establish mail steamship lines, which is the very broadest character of legislation, to appropriate this million of dollars to. Hence I assert that this amendment is obnoxious to the twenty-ninth rule, that it contains general legislation.

Mr. GARLAND. This amendment is certainly unfortunate; it seems to be shingled over with objections on questions of order; but I am decidedly of the opinion that Rule 29 does not affect the amendment at all. That rule is simply to prohibit general legislation upon an appropriation bill coming in the shape of an amendment. The language is that an amendment shall not be received that proposes this kind of legislation. The amendment says:

For additional postal service to foreign countries—

As a matter of course that means that there is already a postal service to foreign countries to which this is to be an addition—

Additional postal service to foreign countries—

How much?

one million dollars, to be expended under the direction of the Postmaster-General, in the establishment of mail steamship lines, equitably distributed among the Atlantic, Mexican-Gulf, and Pacific ports.

Mr. WALLACE. Will not those be new steamship lines?

Mr. GARLAND. That may be very true, but the language of the first part of the amendment conveys the idea that it is additional. It is simply to increase, if you please, an existing service, just as you would provide for carrying the mail on an additional mail-route. Upon that and for that you make the appropriation. It is done every year in the postal appropriation bill. This is simply an addition to a service that already exists.

In the establishment of mail steamship lines, equitably distributed among the Atlantic, Mexican-Gulf, and Pacific ports.

The Senator from Texas has furnished me the Revised Statutes, section 4006, the law in reference to the establishment of postal service to foreign countries, and this is an appropriation for additional service, to use the language of the amendment. There is already an existing law which this simply expands, which this simply adds new items of expense to. It is scarcely ever the case when an appropriation of this character is made, whether by amendment or original bill, that directions are not given in the shape of mandates of law to the officer as to how he shall execute it or how he shall disburse the money. It becomes, therefore, a very difficult question to determine in these appropriation bills what makes legislation, what are the features of legislation in directing the expending of the appropriations.

If the point now made be well taken, I wish Senators to bear in mind that about two-thirds of this bill would have to be eviscerated from the body of it by an application of that rule. Let the Senate bear in mind for instance, commencing on line 28 of the bill, that it contains this provision:

And hereafter the Postmaster-General shall cause a condensed advertisement of all general mail-lettings of each State and Territory and of the District of Columbia, as required by the provisions of an act approved May 17, 1878, entitled "An act to regulate the advertising of mail-lettings, and for other purposes."

It goes on for half a page of legislation in this appropriation bill, directing the Postmaster-General what he is to do, and Rule 29 says that an amendment shall not be received which is general legislation; but here is an amendment coming from the committee.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. In the presence of the idea which the Senator from Arkansas suggests, and in elucidation of this subject, I should like to know if the existing postal system between this country and foreign countries is established by law like the postal service on land, as suggested by the Senator from Arkansas? I know no statute of the United States which establishes post-routes between the United States and Great Britain, and the analogy I do not think exists. All the existence such routes have is derived from the regulations of the Post-Office Department, I think.

Mr. GARLAND. The statement of the Senator from Florida is correct as I understand, and, as I have said so often, this simply expands and enlarges that service as our necessities and the exigencies of the Government require it to be done; and it is not, within the sense of Rule 29, making additional legislation or general legislation on an appropriation bill. If so, one-half or three-fourths of the bills we pass are vicious and this bill particularly is vicious, and I can point out four or five provisions that go to make new features in the appropriation bill, imposing new duties on the head of the Department and new duties on the employés and different officials of the United States in disbursing this money. I do not think Rule 29 comes in conflict at all with this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules that the amendment is not in order under Rule 29, and sustains the point of order raised by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MAXEY. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. From the ruling of the Chair the Senator from Texas appeals.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I make this point, that all questions of order under Rule 29 should be submitted to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Questions of relevancy are to be so submitted. Other questions may be decided by the Chair, or the Chair supposes he may in his discretion submit them to the Senate.

Mr. WINDOM. I rose before the Chair decided the question, for the purpose of submitting a reason why I thought this was not general legislation. I will do it as the question now stands, with the permission of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It stands on an appeal.

Mr. WINDOM. I have usually held very strictly both in the committee and in the Senate upon the question of general legislation. I do not believe, however, that this is that character of legislation prohibited by the rules, and for this reason: the amendment goes no further than to direct what shall be done with the money appropriated. The distinction I draw between general legislation and that which is not general, between that prohibited by the rule and that allowable, is this: if you appropriate a sum of money and provide for an organization or for a service to be conducted at some future time independent of the amount of money to be used, I think it would be general legislation; but if you appropriate an amount of money, and confine your amendment to the use of that money, directing what shall be done with it, it seems to me to be legitimate. If that cannot be permitted in an appropriation bill, I think we shall be very much crippled in throwing around any appropriation the proper safeguards. I do not think the length of a provision has anything to do with it, provided you confine your amendment to the use of the money appropriated. This is so confined, and therefore I think it is not general legislation.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator from Minnesota let me ask him a question?

Mr. WINDOM. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. Once or twice before amendments like this engaged the judgment of the Senate on a point of order. I want to inquire of the Senator whether either of those instances was in the case of an appropriation bill, or whether it was only on the post-route bill?

Mr. WINDOM. It was on an appropriation bill that this same point arose.

Mr. CONKLING. Put on by a vote of the Senate?

Mr. WINDOM. I think the Senate voted that it was in order, but I am not positive. That is my recollection.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senate has, I am quite sure, once or twice voted that an amendment like this was in order, but whether upon a general appropriation bill, I was not quite sure. I thought the Senator would know.

Mr. WINDOM. My impression is, though I cannot answer positively, that it was held in order on an appropriation bill, and the amendment on which the Senate formerly voted was very much broader than this; that amendment provided for the establishment of a service which should run through several years and went further than the mere direction as to what should be done with the money appropriated.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. It designated the ports.

Mr. WINDOM. It designated numerous things that had no relation whatever to the distribution or direction of the money appropriated. I want to press upon the Senate this one point: if we cannot direct the use of the money we shall be in a very awkward position in making appropriations in the way of throwing safeguards around them and giving to them that use and direction which the Senate intends.

Mr. CONKLING. Does not this amendment itself make an additional appropriation?

Mr. WINDOM. There is an additional appropriation, and then the amendment, as I understand it, goes on to direct its use. Let me read it:

> For additional postal service to foreign countries, $1,000,000, to be expended, under the direction of the Postmaster-General, in the establishment of mail steamship lines, equitably distributed among the Atlantic, Mexican-Gulf, and Pacific ports: Provided, That the vessels employed for such service shall be owned and manned by American citizens, and that said vessels thus employed shall be iron steamships, accepted by the Secretary of the Navy, after due inspection, as in all respects seaworthy and properly fitted to such service.

Every word in the amendment after "dollars" shows how the million dollars is to be expended. I do not think it is general legislation within the meaning of the rule.

Mr. WHYTE. May I ask the Senator from Minnesota before he concludes, if this is not general legislation in that it changes the present condition of the law in regard to the foreign mail service? I would like to ask the Senator from Minnesota whether the foreign mail service is not now conducted upon contracts made by the Postmaster-General after advertising for bids and whether this does not put this money at his disposal to distribute it as he pleases among such steamship lines as he selects?

Mr. WINDOM. I cannot see how it changes any existing law on the subject.

Mr. WHYTE. I ask the Senator if the existing law does not require the Postmaster-General to advertise for bids and to make contracts with the lowest bidder for the carrying of the mail?

Mr. CONKLING. Not unless a proposed route has been established.

Mr. WHYTE. I mean in regard to the foreign service.

Mr. WINDOM. I think not.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. There is no such provision of law.

Mr. WHYTE. I think it is so.

Mr. WINDOM. I believe no foreign mails are carried by contract.

Mr. WHYTE. I do not know, but I think so. Section 4006 of the Revised Statutes provides:

> The Postmaster-General, after advertising for proposals, may enter into contracts or make suitable arrangements for transporting the mail through any foreign country, between any two points in the United States, &c.

Section 4007 provides:

> The Postmaster-General may, after advertising for proposals, enter into contract for the transportation of the mail between the United States and any foreign country whenever the public interests will thereby be promoted.

> 4008. The mail between the United States and any foreign port, or between ports of the United States touching at a foreign port, shall be transported in steamships; but the Postmaster-General may have such transportation performed by sailing vessels when the service can be facilitated thereby.
> 4010. The Postmaster-General may impose fines on contractors for transporting the mail between the United States and any foreign country, for any unreasonable or unnecessary delay in the departure of such mail, or the performance of the trip; but the fine for any one default shall not exceed one-half of the contract price for the trip.

I think that all recognizes the making of contracts after advertising for proposals. How can you fine a man for a breach of contract if you do not have to make a contract with him after advertising for proposals?

Mr. WINDOM. I want to suggest one point to the Senator from Maryland. If I understand the law he has read, it is simply permissive; the Postmaster-General may do it, but I am informed by members of the Post-Office Committee that he does not do it; and suppose the law does authorize him, this is simply in conformity with it. He may act under that law in doing the same thing now.

Mr. WHYTE. It occurred to me that under the law he was to make a contract with the company that would do the work for the lowest sum. That is the usual mode of making contracts with this Government.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will pardon me, I do not know but that he is right, but as I ventured to reply in a word to his suggestion, I will explain as well as I can what I meant. In the case of a post-route established and regulated, the Postmaster-General is to do what the Senator has now read, and he is to act under statutes still more specific. In the case of foreign and ocean service the Postmaster-General may do what the Senator has read, and doing it the vessel, if a steam-vessel, may be allowed an amount not exceeding all the sea postage and all the inland postage; if the vessel be a foreign or a sailing vessel, the Postmaster-General may allow any sum not exceeding all the sea postage. That is the law as I understand it.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Will the Senator from New York yield for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. CONKLING. I will yield altogether in a moment, and be very glad to vote for the Senator's motion. There being two sets of provisions, one those relating to the establishment of post-routes, and the other the general provisions to which the Senator from Maryland has referred, I submit to him this proposition: The amendment proposes that under the direction of the Postmaster-General this shall be done. Why would it not be in exact accordance with the provisions of law the Senator has read? How does it change those provisions? On the contrary, as to that point it strikes me that this amendment is not only in aid of those provisions, not only consistent with them, but entirely subordinate to them, because the amendment says "under the direction of the Postmaster-General in the establishment of mail steamship lines."

Mr. WHYTE. But it limits him to American vessels of a particular character.

Mr. CONKLING. The proviso is:

> Provided, That the vessels employed for such service shall be owned and manned by American citizens, and that said vessels thus employed shall be iron steamships, accepted by the Secretary of the Navy, after due inspection, as in all respects seaworthy and properly fitted to such service.

That follows and if that is the Senator's point, I am not sure that he is not right so far that it would restrict the Postmaster-General from employing foreign ships and sailing ships. In this respect it follows provisions which were attached to three statutes relating to the carrying of mails from San Francisco to Hong Kong which provided, the last of them, that the ships should be iron ships as to the future service, of 4,000 tons registered burden, to be surveyed and inspected and accepted, and further provided that in case of war they should be purchasable at an appraisement by the Government. This amendment in that respect seems to run somewhat in that groove.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I would like to suggest to the Senator from New York that, so far as I know, there is no law providing for the establishment of steamship lines. Here is now an appropriation to be expended in the establishment of steamship lines. Is it not legislation on an appropriation bill? There is no general law that establishes such lines of steamships, and I ask now if we provide money to be appropriated to that purpose, is it not general legislation establishing mail steamship lines which do not now exist?

Mr. CONKLING. I can only say that I do not wonder that the Senator from Delaware should ask that question. It is a very serious question and a very hard question to answer, and he puts the objection to this legislation under the rule in the most formidable shape in which it can be presented. That is a question undoubtedly that I do not venture at this moment at all events to discourse upon. I rose only to call the attention of the Senator from Maryland to the fact that, except as to the description of the particular ships to be employed, this would seem to be consonant with the statute which he has been reading.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, as I endeavored to state when I was up before in making the point, if this were an appropriation for the transportation of foreign mails to be expended under the direction of the Postmaster-General, then the proposition made by the Senator from Minnesota would be correct; but it is to be expended in the establishment of mail steamship lines; it is the creation of new lines; it is the employment of ships, and not for transportation of foreign mails alone. It is to create the means by which mails are to be transported. It is to establish by virtue of law the means by which we are to transport the mails to foreign ports, and not for the transportation of the mails alone. That is the point I make.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 10, 1881.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

WESTERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF VIRGINIA.

Mr. CABELL. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a bill of the House returned from the Senate with an amendment, for the purpose of concurring in the amendment of the Senate. It is House bill No. 6599, to change the times for holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the western district of Virginia, held at Danville, Virginia.

Mr. BLOUNT. I shall not object to this proposition, but I give notice that I shall object to the consideration of any bill of importance at this time.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table.

The amendment of the Senate was to add to section 1 the words "instead of the times now fixed by law."

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Mr. CABELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COX. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the morning hour for the call of committees for reports.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask the gentleman to listen to me for a moment.

Mr. COX. I call for the regular order.

Mr. KELLEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report a bill for the purpose of enforcing our treaty with reference to the Netherlands, and to ask that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman want action on the bill now?

Mr. KELLEY. No; only to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. COX. I have no objection to that.

DUTIES ON TEA AND COFFEE.

Mr. KELLEY, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. No. 7158) to repeal discriminating duties on tea and coffee the products of the possessions of the Netherlands; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to give notice that I will on Saturday next, or earlier if opportunity offers, call up this bill for action.

KANKAKEE RIVER, INDIANA.

Mr. DE LA MATYR, by unanimous consent, presented concurrent resolutions of the General Assembly of Indiana, in relation to the improvement of the navigation of the Kankakee River, in the State of Indiana; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COX. I move to dispense with the morning hour for reports.

The SPEAKER. That motion is pending, made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.]

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 90, noes 33.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. VAN VOORHIS said: No quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. VAN VOORHIS and Mr. COX were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 122, noes 28.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the morning hour for reports of committees was dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour under the new rule adopted on yesterday commences at twenty-five minutes past eleven o'clock.

Mr. COX. Let the new rule be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, After to-day, on each day of the remainder of the session other than the third Monday of February and the last six days, whenever on motion the morning hour shall be dispensed with by a two-thirds vote, that hour shall be set apart for the consideration of bills on the several calendars and on the Speaker's table under the following regulations: The States and Territories shall be called in order as now provided for, and as each is called, one of its members shall be named by the Speaker, selected in alphabetical order, who may move the consideration of a bill; if objected to by five members rising in their seats it shall not be considered, otherwise the member making the motion shall be entitled to five minutes for explanation of his bill, or, instead thereof, to the reading of the report accompanying the same, provided the reading of such report shall not exceed five minutes, and then a vote shall be taken. The call of States shall go on from day to day until completed, as above provided, and whenever all the Members and Delegates from any State or Territory have been named by the Speaker, such State or Territory shall thereafter be omitted from the call until all the Members and Delegates shall have been so named. Any member not answering as his name is called shall be considered to have waived his privilege.

The SPEAKER. Under this rule the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. CLEMENTS.

BONDS TO BE TAKEN BY MARSHALS.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. No. 6535) to allow marshals and deputy marshals to take bond in certain cases.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That in all cases of misdemeanor it shall be the duty of the court or officer by whose authority a warrant shall issue for the arrest of any person residing more than twenty miles from the place at which such warrant is returnable, to fix and cause to be indorsed on the warrant, at the time of its issuance, an amount at which the arresting officer may take bail, as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. That the marshal or other officer executing such warrant shall, on the request of the defendant, discharge him on his giving bond in the sum so fixed, with good and sufficient sureties, for his appearance at the next term of the court having jurisdiction of the offense, and from term to term thereafter until discharged by law, to answer any indictment which may be found, or information which may be instituted, against him therefor; and if such court is then in session, for his appearance at such present term of the court, and from term to term thereafter as hereinabove provided. If the defendant does not avail himself of the privilege to give bail before the warrant is returned, according to its mandate, future proceedings in the cause shall be had without reference to this act.

Mr. FRYE. Does that bill come under the new rule from one of the calendars, or from the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. It is on the House Calendar, and is a report from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HERBERT. And a unanimous report from that committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will now ask for objections to the consideration of the bill which has been read.

Mr. BROWNE. Before that is done, I desire to make an inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BROWNE. Is this the report of the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. HERBERT. It is the unanimous report of that committee.

Mr. WILSON. Let it go; it is all right.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, can we not object after the report has been read?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will see that in such case the five minutes which may have been occupied in reading the report would be wasted. If objection is to be made, it had better be made as soon as the bill is read; in fact, as the Chair understands, that is the requirement of the rule. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Alabama has five minutes to speak upon the bill, but in lieu of that he calls for the reading of the report.

The Clerk was proceeding to read the report, when

Mr. CONGER said: Mr. Speaker, if when a bill has been read and objection called for, a substitute is to be offered, I think that takes the case out of the rule. We cannot give assent to a substitute before having heard it read at all.

The SPEAKER. The bill which was read was the substitute reported by the committee for the original bill. It is the substitute that is to be voted on.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the report, which is as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 6495) entitled "A bill to allow marshals and deputy marshals to take bonds in certain cases, and for other purposes," beg leave to report the accompanying substitute therefor, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The committee find that, under the present law and practice, defendants are often obliged to be carried long distances—often more than one hundred and fifty miles—at great expense to the Government, to the court, or commissioner issuing the warrant, there to be bailed. If the defendant is able to give bond, he is put to great expense in traveling back home; but it often happens that he is imprisoned because, among strangers, he can find no sureties. The committee can see no reason why the United States officer making the arrest may not take the bond in such sum as may have been fixed by the officer or court ordering the arrest. It is the practice in Alabama, Kentucky, Ohio, and other States for the arresting officer to take bail in many cases, and your committee believe the bill, if it be enacted into a law, will tend greatly to the relief of hardships resulting under the present system, from the fact that criminal process runs in the United States courts over large territory, while at the same time it will tend to reduce expenses.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Mr. Speaker, this bill has received the unanimous report of the Judiciary Committee, as I am informed. I have selected this bill as one among a number of others, but this one in particular as of more interest and importance, and of no ordinary importance to the people of my State. It is intended for the relief of my people as well as to curtail and lessen very greatly the expenses of the General Government.

I have been informed that the annual expenses for marshals and deputy marshals in the State of Alabama amount to the enormous sum of over fifty thousand dollars, and that over four-tenths of this amount is charged to the expenses of marshals and deputy marshals making arrests. It is intended, sir, to relieve the people from unnecessary and grievous hardships and inconvenience. It is also a measure of great economy to the Government.

Sir, I could state instances of arrest in my own district, in Sumter and Green Counties, that would excite not only the sympathy but would stir the indignation of all honest men. Citizens of my district have been arrested on mere trumped-up charges, without any just foundation for such proceedings; dragged from their homes, families, hundreds of miles away among strangers, practically denied the right of bail, and obliged to go to prison, in many cases discharged and obliged to return home at heavy expense, without money to pay their way. Sir, I shrink from contemplating the suffering to which my people have been subjected, and I appeal to this House to permit this bill to pass under the rule, which will bring some mitigation of the hardships of the present practice and system now in force in Alabama.

It will be observed that this bill is well guarded, and limited to cases of misdemeanor, and restricted to persons residing more than twenty miles from the place at which such warrant is returnable. It confers upon the court or officer issuing the warrant the power and authority to fix the amount of bail to be required or taken by the marshal or officer making the arrest. Under the present law and practice, defendant and parties arrested for mere misdemeanor are often compelled to travel long distances, often more than one hundred and fifty and even two hundred miles, at great expense to the Government to appear before the court or commissioner issuing the warrant, there to be bailed. If the defendant is able to give bond he is put to great expense in traveling back home; but it often happens that he is obliged to go to prison because, away from home and friends, among strangers, he can find no sureties. I can see no reason why the United States officers making the arrest may not take the bond in such sum as may have been fixed by the officer or court ordering the arrest, as provided in this bill. As stated in the report of the committee, this is the practice in Alabama, Kentucky, Ohio, and other States, for the arresting officer to take bail in many cases in State courts, and I am persuaded and believe that this bill, if enacted into a law, will greatly relieve my people of hardships resulting under the present system, from the fact that criminal process runs in the United States courts over a very large extent of territory, while at the same time it will tend greatly to reduce the expense of the Government. Sir, we have felt most keenly and severely the workings and hardships of the present system practiced by the marshals. Our people are arrested for minor cases of misdemeanor, often without cause, carried one hundred and fifty or two hundred miles before the court or commissioner, there to give bond among strangers, when all this expense and unnecessary trouble could be avoided and the party allowed to make bond at the time and place of his arrest. Sir, I appeal to the sense of this House in behalf of my people that this bill be passed at once.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLEMENTS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHEROKEE AND ARKANSAS RIVER RAILROAD COMPANY.

The SPEAKER. The next State in order under this call is the State of Arkansas; and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Arkansas, Mr. CRAVENS.

Mr. CRAVENS. I move to take from the House Calendar for passage under this call the bill (H. R. No. 6061) to incorporate the Cherokee and Arkansas River Railroad Company. It has been unanimously reported, with amendments, from the Committee on Railways and Canals.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill to incorporate the Cherokee and Arkansas River Railroad Company.

Be it enacted, &c., That Thomas Nickerson, Sterne Morse, T. Jefferson Coolidge, B. P. Cheney, Alden Speare, Isaac T. Burr, Charles W. Pierce, C. J. Paine, F. H. Peabody, Thomas Dana, George B. Wilbur, Lucius G. Pratt, Solomon S. Sleeper, Warren Sawyer, and Levi C. Wade, of Massachusetts; W. B. Strong, E. Wilder, George T. Anthony, William P. Hackney, John M. Steele, E. H. Funston, Almerin Gillett, W. H. Guy, —— Hubbard, of Kansas; Granville Wilcox, of Arkansas; J. M. Keating, George W. Armistead, Edward Whitemore, of Tennessee, and Thomas Sherlock, of Ohio, their associates and successors, are hereby incorporated under the name of The Cherokee and Arkansas River Railroad Company, with authority to construct, maintain, and operate a line of railroad and telegraph, beginning at Arkansas City, in the State of Kansas, and running through the Indian Territory, by the best practicable route, following, substantially, the general course of the Arkansas River, and bridging the same where necessary, to a point at or near Fort Smith, in the State of Arkansas; and said corporation is vested with all the powers, privileges, and immunities necessary to carry into effect the purposes of this act, and is subject to all general laws which now are and hereafter may be in force relating to railroad corporations. The capital stock shall not exceed $4,300,000. It shall be divided into shares of the par value of $100 each, to be deemed personal property and transferable on the books of the corporation as the by-laws may prescribe.

SEC. 2. That within thirty days after the passage of this act the persons named in the first section, and their associates, shall meet pursuant to a notice signed by at least ten of said persons, a copy of which shall have been mailed to each of the others at least ten days before the time appointed. Ten of such persons shall constitute a quorum, and they shall organize under this act and choose not less than five persons to act as directors until others are chosen by the subscribers to the capital stock, who shall be called together for that purpose by the acting directors, upon not less than ten days' notice, when not less than 1,000 shares of said stock have been in good faith subscribed for. By-laws may be adopted at said last-named meeting, and the same may be altered, amended, or repealed, as may therein be provided. In each year thereafter there shall be a meeting of the stockholders, to be known as the annual meeting, for the choice of directors, not less than seven in number, all of whom shall be stockholders, and shall serve for the ensuing year and until their successors are chosen.

SEC. 3. That the directors may make contracts and execute leases and conveyances and accept the same in the name of the corporation, transact all its business, provide for the construction, maintenance, and operation of the railroad and telegraph, and may mortgage the property and franchises of the corporation therefor, and are vested with all the powers necessary thereto. They shall give an account of their doings upon the request of any five stockholders at the annual meeting, and prior thereto shall submit to the stockholders a report of the condition of the railroad, telegraph, appurtenances, and equipment, the earnings, expenditures, indebtedness, assets, and liabilities of the corporation.

SEC. 4. That said corporation shall file in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, under its corporate seal, its acceptance of the provisions of this act within sixty days from the passage thereof, and shall then be entitled to the benefits of the provisions contained in sections 1 and 4 of the act approved March 3, 1875, entitled "An act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States."

SEC. 5. That said corporation, having complied with the requirements of section 4 of this act, is hereby authorized and empowered to construct its railroad and telegraph through any Indian lands or reservation when the same shall be necessary to the construction of its said line, and for that purpose to condemn a right of way to the extent of one hundred feet on each side of the central line of its said road, and shall have the right to take, from the lands adjacent to the line of said road, material, earth, stone, and timber necessary for the construction and maintenance of said railroad and telegraph; also grounds adjacent to said right of way for stations, buildings, depots, machine-shops, side-tracks, turnouts, and wood, coal, and water stations, not to exceed twenty acres for each station, to the extent of one station for each ten miles of its road. And said corporation may enter upon and take private property, subject to and in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of an act approved July 2, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862," and if at the time of such taking there shall be no judge of a court of record within said Indian Territory, or having jurisdiction over any part thereof, then condemnation shall be made and compensation paid for property taken and damages sustained under such regulations and before such tribunal as the President shall appoint. Said railroad and telegraph may be constructed through any military or other reservation set apart for the use of the United States.

SEC. 6. That this act is upon the express condition that said company shall begin to construct its line within six months, and complete the same within two years from the passage of this act, so as to perfect a through connection to the Mississippi River at Memphis, Tennessee, for both passengers and freight, without change or break of bulk.

Before the reading of the bill had been concluded,

Mr. TUCKER said: Have objections been called for?

The SPEAKER. They have not.

Mr. CLYMER. I want to reserve all points of order on this bill.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The reading of the bill will be concluded, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. CLYMER. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLYMER. My point is this: that this act of incorporation gives the right of way through the public lands, and gives, as I understand, twenty acres of land to each section of the road not exceeding one mile.

The SPEAKER. Ten miles.

Mr. CLYMER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not know what may be determined to be the proper practice under this new rule. Under the rules as they have heretofore existed, no bill which made an appropriation or which granted lands or property of the United States could be considered in the first instance save in Committee of the Whole; and I do not believe the rules in that respect have been changed. Therefore, in my judgment, the point of order lies that this bill must go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MANNING. There is not an acre of public land given away.

Mr. CLYMER. The right of way is given.

Mr. MANNING. Not at all. The gentleman listens but poorly, I apprehend, if he supposes that this bill appropriates one dollar of public money or gives away one acre of land.

The SPEAKER. This bill came from the Committee on Railways and Canals, and is on the House Calendar, it consequently comes within the scope of the rule.

Mr. MANNING. I was going to remark for the information of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that this bill merely gives power to condemn the right of way, but the company must pay for every inch of ground. Not one dollar of money, and not one acre of the public land, is given away by the bill. I may remark in addition, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] has called my attention in a private conversation with me a moment ago to a criticism that might be pronounced upon the bill in its present shape——

Mr. BREWER. I object to a discussion of the merits of the bill on the point of order.

Mr. MANNING. I do not want to discuss the bill, but to make a statement of fact which I apprehend the gentleman will be glad to hear if he will give me an instant. It was suggested that this bill improperly undertook to incorporate a railroad in the State of Kansas and the State of Arkansas, running across the Indian Territory, Arkansas City, in the State of Kansas, being the point of beginning, and Fort Smith, in the State of Arkansas, the point of termination. But I have this moment amended the bill so as to meet this objection, which I am sure will be satisfactory to the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. CRAVENS,] who has invited the action of the House at this moment. Under the bill as modified the road will begin in the Indian Territory, near Arkansas City, and will stop in the Indian Territory, near Fort Smith, the former being within a mile or two of the line between Kansas and the Indian Territory and the latter within a mile or two of the line between Arkansas and the Indian Territory.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BREWER] objects to debate on the merits of the bill.

Mr. MANNING. There is no debate; I was merely making that statement.

Mr. BREWER. An explanation of the bill is debate.

The SPEAKER. The point made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] is that this bill donates a part of the public property of the United States and must first be considered in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. FRYE. Before the Speaker makes a decision on that point I desire to be heard for a single moment, because if that point is decided one way then this new rule becomes absolutely worthless.

The SPEAKER. Not necessarily so. The Chair would suggest that a motion to go into Committee of the Whole to be there considered might be entertained.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Speaker, the point which is raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania goes further a great deal than the mere point that this bill contains a donation of public lands. There is the same rule if a bill contains any appropriation whatever it must be first considered in the Committee of the Whole. Therefore, if the Speaker sustains this point of order made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, then to preserve consistency he will be obliged to sustain the point of order if made against any bill which contains any appropriation of money or land. I suppose nine out of ten bills on the Calendar contain an appropriation. Therefore, if the Speaker should rule that point to be well taken, then nine out of ten bills on the House Calendar would be taken out from under this rule, except by another rule which the Speaker suggests.

If the Speaker pleases, there are the rules; and that is simply one of the rules adopted by this House, that every bill containing an appropriation shall be first considered in the Committee of the Whole. Here comes an additional rule and this rule says distinctly, affirmatively, positively, that whenever the morning hour is dispensed with by a two-thirds vote—and there comes in the power of the House—by a two-thirds vote, then the States shall be called; and when a name is reached and called in its alphabetical order the gentleman bearing the name shall present a bill from the Calendar to the House for its consideration. Then, to preserve the House again, if five members object in their seats, it shall not be considered; but if five men do not rise, then that bill shall be considered, that gentleman shall have five minutes for debate or for the reading of the report. It then goes one step further and says: "And the House shall vote upon it." The House shall vote upon it! Now, sir, under any fair construction of this last rule life and force must be given to it if it is not in conflict with former rules. If it is in conflict, the intention and purpose of the House in passing the rule would control and govern in this last rule. And it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, entirely clear that the other rule is repealed to this extent when a bill is presented through this devious road which this resolution itself marks out. I hope, therefore, the Speaker will not sustain the point of order.

Mr. CLYMER. Mr. Speaker, these two rules, the new and the old one on this subject, must be considered together. That is the fair, legal rule of construction. Now, this new rule is that under certain circumstances a certain member may move the consideration of a bill. The general existing rule is no bill containing an appropriation may be considered save in the Committee of the Whole. Now, it is presumed he may move only the consideration of a bill, which may be considered in the House, and which must not by its terms be considered in the Committee of the Whole. The two rules can stand together, and hence it is I have made the point of order, so that the Speaker may make a ruling which will protect the Treasury, and which will protect—I do not say in this case, and I do not say in every case, but in many cases—from depletion. For, sir, in five minutes under this rule who can do that justice to the rights of the Government which is necessary in order to a fair consideration of the subject? And I hold the only fair construction which can be put upon it, the only safe construction which can be put upon the new rule by the Speaker, is the one I have prayed for.

Mr. ROBESON. I think the point of order made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is a good one, and for this reason: we have general rules which govern the introduction of bills, and we have special rules which apply to special bills. Now we made a general rule yesterday for the rest of the session to govern the general introduction of bills, but that general rule does not repeal a particular exception which applies to a particular class of bills. That is a principle of legal construction of every law and of every rule. Ordinary bills come in under certain conditions. Bills appropriating money or public property come in under certain other restrictions. That particular, definite restriction is not repealed by a general rule unless it is specially pointed to that, and specially stated, it does apply such a repeal.

Mr. HATCH. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. ROBESON. I am not arguing this question with regard to this bill, or with regard to any other particular bill. But, sir, that is the principle upon which the rule must be construed, and when you depart from it you are afloat on an ocean of doubt and difficulty. We have applied for the protection of the Treasury and the protection of the property of the United States a special restriction to appropriation bills; and that will not be repealed under any rule, unless it is particularly referred to and particularly stated. The general provision applying to general bills and the general introduction of bills does not repeal it.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, on this point of order——

Mr. HATCH. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. There is a point of order already pending.

Mr. HATCH. I wish to ask a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HATCH. I wish to ask if the time consumed in the discussion of this point of order comes out of the hour allowed for the introduction and passage of bills by unanimous consent under this rule?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. HATCH. Then I hope the question will be decided without discussion.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I will not undertake to discuss the question whether the point of order raised against this bill is well taken or not. I desire for a moment the attention of the House and the eye of the Speaker while I state a fact which is important in this connection. I have been trying for more than a year to get the eye of the Speaker and the ear of the House on this bill. I undertake to say now that if gentlemen are right in their conclusion they are wrong in their premises. There is no money or property of the United States appropriated by this bill or disposed of by it in any manner. It distinctly declares that simply the right of way is asked for, but does not part with a dollar of public property.

Mr. PAGE. I call the gentleman to order; he is discussing the merits of the bill. As I understand it, no debate is allowed on the merits of it except the five minutes under the rule.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. But gentlemen assume in making the point of order that this bill proposes to take the property or money of the United States, and I am simply showing in fact that it does not. It goes through the Indian Territory——

Mr. PAGE. I think the gentleman is certainly discussing the merits of the bill.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. The gentleman is mistaken. I am discussing the point of order which has been raised against the bill. I am trying to explain that the point of order cannot lie against it for the reason that no property of the Government is disposed of in any shape or form. I say that it passes through the Indian Territory——

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I make this point of order: that this discussion in reference to the point raised upon this bill is premature, and under the rule——

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Have I the floor or not?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has risen to a point of order which the Chair will hear.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I make the point of order that it is not in order to discuss the question of order raised upon the bill until it is before the House for consideration. This bill is not properly before the House for consideration under the rule which we have just adopted. The Speaker has not called for objections; five members have not risen in their places and made objection. If five members do rise in their places and object to the consideration of it the point of order is useless; and I insist that that question should be asked first. If the bill is before the House for consideration, then gentlemen are privileged to make their points of order. If that question is asked upon this and many other bills without reference to the point of order the bill will be defeated.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. If the gentleman is through I would like to continue. In addition to what I have said——

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The point of order can only be made after the bill is before the House for consideration.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. If any other gentleman desires to be heard, I hope they will go on now. If not I would like to be heard a few moments myself at this time. I want to say further, Mr. Speaker, that while there is no property of the Government sought to be appropriated or disposed of under the provisions of this bill, neither is there any attempt to deprive the Indian tribes of their property without their consent or without compensation. Treaty stipulations already protect them and provision is made for their consent. The terms of the bill provide that the consent of the Indian tribes shall be obtained, which I believe is provided for under existing treaties already. There can be no objection to the passage of this bill. It simply throws open the great grain regions of the West by a railroad line four hundred and fifty miles long, whereas we now have some fourteen hundred miles.

Mr. STEPHENS. Has the point of order been decided?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. STEPHENS. I desire to be heard for a moment upon the point of order.

The SPEAKER. As suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON,] the Chair will first submit the question to the House as to objections under the rule.

Mr. STEPHENS. I wish to be heard then on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman if the bill is allowed to come before the House for consideration. The Chair thinks it would be proper under the rule to ask first if there be objection.

Mr. CLYMER. Suppose five gentlemen do object?

The SPEAKER. That, of course, will dispose of the point of order, because the bill will not be before the House. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] More than five members having objected, the bill is not before the House for consideration.

FORTS READING AND CROOK MILITARY RESERVATIONS, CALIFORNIA.

The State of California being called,

Mr. BERRY asked the consideration of Senate bill No. 1487.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to restore the lands included in the Fort Reading and Fort Crook military reservations, in the State of California, to the public domain, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the lands included in the Fort Reading military reservation and in the Fort Crook military reservation, in the State of California, are hereby restored to the public domain.

SEC. 2. That all patents heretofore issued to any lands within the Fort Reading military reservation and Fort Crook military reservation are hereby confirmed.

SEC. 3. That the rights of all settlers on said reservations to acquire title under the homestead and pre-emption laws are hereby recognized and affirmed to the extent such settlers would have acquired by settling on public lands.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PRESCOTT. Let the report be read.

The SPEAKER. The first question will be on the consideration. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection to the consideration.

Mr. BERRY. I will make a brief statement, Mr. Speaker, in reference to this bill, as there is no report accompanying it. This is a Senate bill, and though it passed the Senate, it has not been considered by the House; but I have a report of the Secretary of War, and also from the Land Commissioner, recommending the passage of the House bill, which is precisely the same as the Senate bill. These reservations had been abandoned for a number of years, and were taken possession of by settlers, the Indians having gone off of them, on the supposition that they could acquire valid and legal title thereto. In fact, the Land Department itself did not know but that it was part of the public domain, and granted patents and permitted bona fide residents to acquire title to the same. The President never declared it to be a reservation. It is simply a reservation by virtue of the general law that establishes a reservation wherever a soldier or detachment of the Army stops. I can conceive of no possible objection to the bill.

Mr. PAGE. Will my colleague allow me one moment?

Mr. BERRY. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAGE. Does the War Department acquiesce?

Mr. BERRY. The War Department recommends this; the Commissioner of the Land Office recommends it; and here are the letters, if the House desires to have them read.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BERRY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MANNING. I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANNING. When gentlemen take the responsibility of defeating a bill by objecting to it, should their names not be recorded? [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is not necessary. The gentlemen who objected rose in their places.

The next State called in alphabetical order was Colorado. Mr. BELFORD, the Representative of that State, was not in his seat.

Mr. ATKINS. As the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] is not in his seat, I ask unanimous consent that he may have his opportunity when he comes in.

Mr. SIMONTON. If that is agreed to other gentlemen should have the same privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the proposition. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Colorado, not now in his seat, may have the privilege of calling up a bill when he comes in.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I object.

MARY LEGGETT.

The SPEAKER. The next State in order under this call is the State of Connecticut, and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. HAWLEY.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4610) granting a pension to Mary Leggett. The bill is on the Private Calendar.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Leggett, widow of Robert Leggett, late private Tenth Connecticut Volunteers, to date from the date of the soldier's death.

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. TUCKER. Does not the same point of order lie against this bill as that which was before the House a few moments ago?

The SPEAKER. The point of order was not raised at the proper time. It is now too late.

The bill was then passed.

MILTON L. SPARR.

The State of Florida having been called,

Mr. BISBEE called up the bill (S. No. 1193) granting a pension to Milton L. Sparr, said bill being on the Private Calendar.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Milton L. Sparr, as second lieutenant of Company K, Nineteenth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. TUCKER. I make the point of order on that bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia makes the point of order that this bill comes under the rule of the House which requires it to be first considered in Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. HASKELL. Mr. Speaker, upon that point of order I desire to say a word.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. HASKELL. The point has been made twice upon this floor and it ought to be met and settled. And I desire to call the attention of the House now to one or two facts, a careful consideration of which I believe will induce the Speaker and the House to agree that the point of order is not well taken.

In Rule XXIII, one of the general rules of this House that have been in operation for about two years, is the provision under which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] raises the point of order—that is, that all proceedings touching appropriations of money or bills making appropriations of money or property shall be considered in Committee of the Whole. That is a good rule and a wise rule, because it compels the consideration of every such bill in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised he did not submit this bill to the right of five members to object. The Chair should have done so before entertaining the point of order. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill? The Chair does not see any one member rising to object. The bill is before the House and the Chair recognizes the point of order.

Mr. HASKELL. This provision of the rule is wise and just because when a question of money or property is involved it compels a careful consideration by the House. In order to provide for the consideration of those bills there are separate calendars, one the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and the other the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of private bills.

Those calendars contain these bills which make money appropriations and appropriations of land. Now, then, the new rule and the later legislation must take the place of the former. In the new rule it is specifically provided, and the language is mandatory, that a member may, when his name is called, demand the consideration of a bill that is on the House Calendar or a bill that is on the Speaker's table, or a bill that is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, or a bill that is on the Private Calendar. And unless five persons rise and object the language of the rule is that that bill shall be considered.

It becomes clear, then, Mr. Speaker, that this later legislation specifically and directly including the bills on the Speaker's table leads directly to the point that a bill may be taken from the Calendar and may be considered. It "shall be," says the rule, unless five men object. Therefore in this hour, under this particular rule, at this time, the ordinary and general provision that a bill appropriating money or property shall be considered in Committee of the Whole falls to the ground. The new rule takes its place; and the safeguard that is thrown around the Treasury is that it is to be presumed that if it is a dangerous bill about which there may be two opinions, five men in all this multitude will object. I hold, therefore, that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. TUCKER and Mr. STEPHENS addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first recognize the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] after which he will recognize the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER.]

Mr. STEPHENS. I wish to say but a word or two. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] presented the strongest argument in support of this point of order, and it is to his argument that I wish to make a few words of reply.

The argument of the gentleman was that the rule of this House adopted yesterday cannot repeal or modify or change a special rule of the House in regard to bills appropriating money or property.

Now, I maintain that that is just exactly what this new rule did do, just what it was intended to do. The object of the new rule was in some way and under certain circumstances to reach every bill on the various calendars of the House. Those calendars can only be opened up for consideration in this hour by a two-thirds vote, and a two-thirds vote has opened the door to those bills. It takes two-thirds of this House to allow us to take bills from the various calendars and from the Speaker's table for consideration at this time, when called up by members as their States are called. After those bills have been designated by the members of the States so called, then, if five members of this House object to their consideration, the bills are not considered, but the call of States must be proceeded with.

I did not intend and do not need to say any more. Under the new rule which we adopted yesterday, if the point of order now made be held good, there is no object or purpose in the rule and it becomes little less than a farce.

Mr. TUCKER. I do not intend to say anything on the point of order. I raised it because it was raised against a bill which had been called up by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CRAVENS] when that State was called. I desire the rule to operate as to all bills if the point of order is properly raised. I want the Speaker to decide whether the point of order is properly taken, in order that it may apply to both sides of this House and to all the States.

I have no objection to the consideration of a pension bill. I have never voted against a pension bill. I do not object to the consideration of this bill now, unless it is open to a point of order. If it is, then the bill should be set aside.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] by not objecting to the bill when objections were called for indicated that he was not opposed to the bill itself.

Mr. CLYMER. One word in reply to what was said by the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. HASKELL.] There are three calendars of this House; the one called the Union Calendar, the one called the Private Calendar, and the House Calendar. The new rule provides that bills may be taken for consideration from these several calendars and also from the Speaker's table. What follows? Clearly not that it shall embrace bills which are prohibited by the existing rule from consideration in the House, bills appropriating money or the property of the Government; but it refers to bills which are not under the ban of such rules. By giving the new rule that construction both rules may stand and be operative.

Mr. STEPHENS. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. CLYMER. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS. This new rule opens every calendar without limitation; that is what the new rule does.

Mr. CLYMER. But the limitation existed under an old rule, and was not repealed by the new rule either directly or by implication.

Mr. STEPHENS. When two-thirds of the House vote that the doors shall be opened without restriction or limitation, of course they are opened.

Mr. CLYMER. But two-thirds have never said so.

Mr. STEPHENS. They have.

Mr. CLYMER. The vote yesterday was not a two-thirds vote.

Mr. STEPHENS. Two-thirds said so this morning by doing away with the morning hour for reports.

Mr. CLYMER. Oh, this morning; I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. STEPHENS. And these bills cannot be reached under this new rule except by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. CLYMER. There is nothing in the new rule which suspends the operation of the old rule, but both may stand. The gentleman is too old and practical a lawyer not to know that the rule of construction is that where there are two acts of legislation and a construction can be given to both that will allow both to be operative, it must be given.

Mr. STEPHENS. The last will always prevail.

Mr. HASKELL. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] answer a question?

Mr. CLYMER. I will endeavor to do so.

Mr. HASKELL. One of these calendars from which the new rule provides that bills may be taken for consideration in this hour is a calendar specially set apart for money bills. Now, if the new rule does not intend that a money bill shall be taken up for consideration during this hour, why does the rule provide for bills on all the calendars? The rule uses these words—"bills on the several calendars." That is a specific repeal of the general provision of the rules during this hour.

Mr. CLYMER. Let me reply to the gentleman by asking him whether the Union Calendar does not contain a large number of bills which do not appropriate money or property?

Mr. HASKELL. I do not know that it does.

Mr. CLYMER. The gentleman can inform himself.

Mr. HASKELL. The rule provides that every bill which appropriates money or property shall go upon the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole, and those that do not appropriate money or property shall go on the House Calendar, and private bills go upon the Private Calendar whether they appropriate money or not. Under the new rule the three calendars and the Speaker's table are open, and bills from those calendars may now be considered, must be considered when called up properly, unless objected to by five members.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire to make a single suggestion. If the Chair shall rule that this point of order is well taken, it would be a ruling that would bear no fruit. Suppose that this bill must be technically considered in Committee of the Whole? It could only be considered in the Committee of the Whole for five minutes, the same as it is considered in the House, and no advantage would be obtained in that way. Therefore, I think that this rule should not be construed technically as the gentleman claims, because so construed the rule would accomplish nothing.

Mr. ROBESON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] who has the floor yields to me for a moment. I desire to make one suggestion with regard to this question of order in reply to the answer of the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. HASKELL,] which was very pointed and very strong. According to my original proposition, the first rule of construction is that when two laws or two rules relate to the same subject, they must be construed together, and both must be given effect, if that be possible. If it be not possible, then the last rule must prevail, and the former is repealed. But the last general rule never repeals a special rule.

Mr. SPRINGER. There is no special rule here.

Mr. ROBESON. If there is a special law or rule referring to a particular individual or a particular class, a general law or rule covering all individuals and all classes does not repeal, and is not held to be inconsistent with, the prior special provision. That I understand to be a general rule of construction. Now, the gentleman from Kansas meets this point fairly, and says the provision that an hour shall be set apart for the consideration of bills on the several calendars and on the Speaker's table is a special provision repealing a special rule with regard to money and property bills, requiring such bills to be considered in Committee of the Whole. But let me remind the gentleman that his answer falls short of the point, because the rule is not that those bills shall not be considered, but that they shall be considered in the Committee of the Whole.

Now, there is no provision in this rule which takes that calendar out of the Committee of the Whole; and when this rule says that bills on that calendar shall be considered they must still be considered according to general rules applicable to them.

Mr. HOUSE. This rule takes a bill off the Calendar.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HAYES. I would like to know if this discussion is for the benefit of the Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes it is.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this question is clear. What is the proposition in this rule?

The States and Territories shall be called in order as now provided for, and as each is called one of its members shall be named by the Speaker.

This, of course, cannot refer to proceedings in Committee of the Whole.

One of its members shall be named by the Speaker, selected in alphabetical order, who may move the consideration of a bill.

This is the proposition without any qualification. The member selects for himself a bill and moves its consideration. What obstacle does the rule recognize to the consideration of the bill?

If objected to by five members rising in their seats, it shall not be considered.

Otherwise the inference is clear, and the language specific too, that the bill shall be considered.

Otherwise—

That is, if five members do not object—

the member making the motion shall be entitled to five minutes for explanation of his bill, or instead thereof to the reading of the report accompanying the same, provided the reading of such report shall not exceed five minutes; and then a vote shall be taken.

The effect of the rule is clear. When a member is recognized by the Speaker and calls up a bill, if objection is not made to its consideration by five members the gentleman calling it up is then to have five minutes to explain it, or the report shall be read, and then the vote is to be taken.

Now, Mr. Speaker, was it not competent for this House to adopt that rule? Was it not the purpose of the House to do this identical thing? And is the will of the House to be thwarted by technical constructions of law?

Mr. REAGAN. I call for the regular order.

Mr. CONGER. Before this matter passes from the consideration of the House, I desire to say one word. The original object of this rule was to have unanimous consent, and a single objection would have prevented the consideration of a bill. [Cries of "Regular order!"] Mr. Speaker, I took the floor in order to have it when this question should come up again.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman as entitled to the floor. The hour provided for under the new rule has expired.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope this point will be settled before we proceed to other business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

WASHINGTON GASLIGHT COMPANY.

Mr. MURCH. I rise to a question of privilege. I offer as a question of privilege the preamble and resolutions which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman state briefly what is his question of privilege?

Mr. MURCH. I refer to Rule IX, which may be read in connection with the paper I send up.

The SPEAKER. The paper will be read.

Mr. MURCH. I desire the adoption of those resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The resolutions will be read. Until that is done, the Chair is unable to decide whether or not they present a question of privilege.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is currently reported that persons connected as stockholders or otherwise with the Washington Gaslight Company are attempting to influence members of this Congress in matters pertaining to the lighting of the public buildings and the city, and that such persons are using opportunities arising out of their official connection with Congress for such purpose: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Washington Gaslight Company is hereby directed and required to furnish this House immediately with a list of the stockholders of said company, which shall include the names of each stockholder and the number of shares held by each at the present time; also all names of stockholders of record at any time during the six months last past, and that the same be verified under oath by an officer of the said company.

Resolved, That the treasurer of the Washington Gaslight Company is hereby required to furnish to this House immediately a statement of the amount of the capital stock of the said company and a statement of every dividend which has been declared by the said company, whether the same has been made in shares, scrip, or cash, or in any other manner whatsoever, and that such statement shall include an account of the cash and all cash resources or assets on hand or held by the said company at the present time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would rule that the part of this resolution which relates to undue influence on members would be a question of privilege. The Clerk will read that part again.

Mr. MURCH. Very well; I will strike it out of the preamble.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the statement is in the preamble.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is currently reported that persons connected as stockholders or otherwise with the Washington Gaslight Company are attempting to influence members of this Congress in matters pertaining to the lighting of the public buildings and the city, and that such persons are using opportunities arising out of their official connection with Congress for such purposes: Therefore,

The SPEAKER. That part the Chair thinks is a question of privilege. If any member of Congress is being unduly influenced by what the Chair supposes the language to mean, by persons having access to the floor, then the Chair thinks it is a question within the scope of the rules. The call for information is a question the Chair does not decide now.

Mr. MURCH. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to charge ex-members of Congress or persons having access to the floor with any purpose to unduly influence members of this House. But there are officers connected with the House who are charged with being stockholders and directors of this gaslight company.

The second resolution relates to the incorporation and present stockholders of this company. It was chartered in 1849 with a capital stock of $300,000, and to-day it has a stock of $3,000,000. In other words, its capital stock has been increased from $300,000 to $3,000,000. Only $300,000 has ever been paid into the company. The stock has been watered.

I am also informed this company is declaring dividends equal to $300,000 a year, and that at this time it is only waiting for the adjournment of this Congress to declare a surplus dividend of 40 per cent., or $1,200,000. I want this matter thoroughly investigated. I want this company to furnish this House with information connected with every department of its business. It was chartered by Congress, and this House has the right to demand of that company an account of its stock and stockholders at any time, and particularly when charges are being daily made in the newspapers of this city and by individuals throughout this city.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause to be read a decision of his predecessor upon an alleged misconduct of an officer of this House, which seems to be the charge made directly by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. MURCH. I do not make charges directly. It is gravely reported in the newspapers of this city that the statements I make are true.

The SPEAKER. It is alleged?

Mr. MURCH. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman alleges misconduct on the part of an officer of the House.

Mr. MURCH. Not myself, but by journals of this city.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman rises in his place and assumes the responsibility of it. The Clerk will read the former ruling to which the Chair has referred.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Speaker overruled the point of order on the ground that the resolution, though going to the verge to which any matter of privilege of a member of the House should go, involved enough of substance in its connection with the House and legislation to bring it within the rule and definition of a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The case then was as to the misconduct of an officer of the House. Here is alleged misconduct on the part of an officer of the House. Upon that ground the Chair entertains the resolution.

Mr. CONGER. Let the proposition be read.

Mr. MURCH. I move the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. HAZELTON. Is not this a charge made against a director of this company who is now a clerk in some part of the building and not connected with the House?

Mr. MURCH. I have not specified anything.

Mr. HAZELTON. But is not it the fact?

Mr. MURCH. I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will again be read.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. Do I understand the Speaker to rule that the resolutions are a question of privilege, that it is a question of privilege to inquire into the business of the Washington Gaslight Company?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not so rule. The Chair ruled the allegation of misconduct on the part of an officer of the House in unduly influencing members of this House was a question of privilege, and he cited a case where the ruling of a former Speaker to that extent was acquiesced in by the House and of course remains the rule of the House to govern the Chair until reversed by the House itself. Under that precedent the Chair recognizes this resolution.

Mr. MILLS. Is there anything in the law requiring this gaslight company to make report to Congress?

The SPEAKER. That does not enter into the question of privilege.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I shall call for a division.

The SPEAKER. The point suggested by the gentleman from Texas goes to the propriety of the passage of the resolution.

Mr. MILLS. That part of the resolution is improper. The proper way would be for the gentleman to raise a committee of investigation.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is before the House.

Mr. MILLS. This is calling on a private corporation to report to this House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands the previous question. If that be voted down the resolution will be open to amendment.

Mr. MURCH. What amendment does the gentleman suggest?

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman should raise a committee to investigate these charges. That would be the proper way.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. MURCH moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I demand a division of the question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Is not that too late after the main question has been ordered.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. There are two subjects embraced in these resolutions, and I ask a division of the question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes that right. The question is on the first resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I now raise the question of order that the second resolution is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this point of order comes too late.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I understood the Chair to state that this portion of the resolution does not present a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decided that it was a question of order inasmuch as it related to the alleged misconduct of an officer of the House, and the following of course are resolutions seeking to establish the truth of the allegation.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I have no objection to the passage of the resolution itself, but here is a proviso which is specific in its character, has no relation whatever to the allegation contained in the preamble or first resolution, and it does not touch the question of privilege. It relates to an entirely different subject.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it comes within the rule, in view of the fact that it seeks to establish the truth of the allegation contained in the resolution just adopted.

The second resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MURCH moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COX. I demand the regular order. I move to take up the unfinished business, being the apportionment bill.

Mr. REAGAN. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the river and harbor bill.

CORRECTION OF A BILL.

Mr. HAWLEY. I hope the gentleman will yield to me for a moment to ask to make a mere verbal correction in a bill which passed the House this morning. The bill (H. R. No. 4610) which was passed granting a pension to Mary Leggett describes her husband as "late private in the Tenth Connecticut Volunteers." It should read "late lieutenant-colonel of the Tenth Connecticut Volunteers."

Mr. ATKINS. Is there any doubt as to her deserving the pension?

Mr. HAWLEY. No, sir; that has been passed upon already by the House to-day.

Mr. ATKINS. But the action of the House is not the evidence that we should have. I ask if there is any evidence which entitles her to the pension?

Mr. HAWLEY. Undoubtedly; I knew the officer myself. I know the facts in the case.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the amendment will be agreed to.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. REAGAN. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the river and harbor appropriation bill.

Mr. COX. And I raise the question of consideration on the unfinished business, which is the apportionment bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York desires if the motion of the gentleman from Texas is voted down to move to proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, which is the apportionment bill. The issue can then be made.

Mr. GUNTER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make an inquiry. I understood on the day before yesterday that my motion to go to business on the Speaker's table had precedence of either of these motions?

The SPEAKER. After the unfinished business is disposed of; but this motion under two rules of the House comes in ahead.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas that the House resolve itself in Committee of the Whole for the purpose indicated.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 117, noes 60.

Mr. COX. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 150, nays 80, not voting 62; as follows:

On motion of Mr. ACKLEN, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to record my vote. I was not observing when my name was called.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Mississippi that under the rule he is not allowed to present a request for unanimous consent for such a purpose. The statement of the gentleman as to how he would vote will appear in the RECORD.

The following pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

Mr. NICHOLLS with Mr. JOYCE, until further notice.

Mr. RICHMOND with Mr. JORGENSEN.

Mr. JAMES with Mr. O'BRIEN.

Mr. BLAND with Mr. CLAFLIN.

Mr. EWING with Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio, except on the river and harbor bill.

Mr. BAYNE with Mr. FROST, on political questions, until further notice.

Mr. EINSTEIN with Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey, until Thursday, 19th instant, on all questions except where their vote is necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. MULLER with Mr. MCCOOK, until Monday evening, the 14th instant, on all political questions; Mr. MULLER reserving the right to vote on all questions of a quorum.

Mr. LOUNSBERY with Mr. BERRY, until Monday next.

Mr. NICHOLLS with Mr. RICE, until further notice; Mr. RICE reserving the right to pair some other member with Mr. NICHOLLS instead of himself.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware, with Mr. BOYD, on all political questions, until Monday next.

Mr. VAN AERNAM with Mr. HENRY, until further notice.

Mr. SIMONTON with Mr. LE FEVRE.

Mr. FISHER with Mr. HARRIS of Virginia.

Mr. STEPHENS with Mr. DWIGHT, until next Tuesday, on all political or party questions, but as he does not regard this as a question of that character, Mr. STEPHENS votes in the affirmative.

Mr. DAVIDSON with Mr. BRIGGS; Mr. DAVIDSON reserving the right to vote to make a quorum.

Mr. CLAFLIN with Mr. MONEY.

Mr. LAPHAM. Mr. Speaker, I did not vote as I believe there is a pair still existing between the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] and myself.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CARLISLE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union under the order of the House to consider the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. COX. All points of order on this bill were reserved.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is advised all points of order were reserved. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. REAGAN. Unless some member of the House desires a rereading of the bill in full, I will move to dispense with its reading at this time.

Mr. COX. For the purpose of saving time, I will not object to dispensing with the reading of the bill. But I will make a suggestion to my friend from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.] It is impossible for us to find on the files the reports of the chief engineers of the United States Army as to these various improvements. Some of those reports went to the Senate committee; some have come to the House committee. It is a borrowed copy which I have. I say we cannot consider this bill properly until we examine these reports of the engineers. We should at least have time to reflect over night on some of these remarkable appropriations. I have already glanced at the engineers' reports in regard to some of the matters where they wanted to make a beautiful and smooth story. And it does seem to me as if they needed some little discussion, or as if some of the items required it; indeed, as if this whole bill should be raked fore and aft.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask the Chair what is before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. Simply the request of the gentleman from Texas to dispense with the reading of the bill. The Chair did not understand the gentleman from New York objected to that.

Mr. COX. I would like to make a motion that the committee rise that we may have the consideration of this bill postponed till to-morrow, so that we may get these reports which we must have. In the mean time I want to say this: I will cheerfully fill up the time this afternoon with the apportionment bill, [laughter,] and will call the previous question two hours after it is taken up.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to say the gentleman from New York himself is responsible for the river and harbor bill being in the condition it is.

Mr. COX. I assume that responsibility and I am proud of it. And I say it is not fair to bring this up against the apportionment bill. The responsibility rests upon those who bring in a bill such as this, and not on the gentlemen who killed it.

Mr. REAGAN. I am willing to assume my responsibility for anything and everything I do in this House to the American people.

Mr. COX. I have been in the habit of meeting this thing for twenty years. While you were out of Congress I have been in the habit of meeting it.

Mr. BRAGG. I rise to a question of order. Is there any question before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. None except the request made by the gentleman from Texas to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

Mr. COX. I have stated that I will not take up time unnecessarily by objecting to that.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is a matter which ought to be decided without discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to dispensing with the first and formal reading of the bill?

Mr. STEELE. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed to read the bill.

Mr. HOUSE. I hope my friend from North Carolina [Mr. STEELE] will withdraw the objection. To read the bill again would only consume time.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his objection. Let us avoid an extra session if we can.

Mr. STEELE. I wish to ask the Chair if the bill is amendable?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. STEELE. Then I withdraw the objection to dispensing with the first reading.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not desire at this time to enter on a discussion of this bill. If there are other gentlemen who desire to discuss it, I would like, in view of the amount of business before the House undisposed of and the shortness of the period that still remains of the session, that we should have an understanding that general debate shall be as brief as possible.

Mr. SPARKS. Why do you want any general debate?

Mr. REAGAN. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to make a very brief statement, after which it can be determined what time shall be allowed for general debate. I believe that two hours for general debate will be satisfactory.

Mr. ATKINS. Let it be half an hour.

Mr. STEVENSON. I suggest that there be fifteen minutes on each side.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen are aware that this committee can make no order as to closing general debate. It may be closed, however, at any time by a general understanding.

Mr. KENNA. There seems to be no disposition to engage in general debate on this bill. Why cannot we have the understanding that general debate is now closed?

Mr. REAGAN. Before that is done I desire to make a brief statement.

Mr. COX. We cannot have general debate, as the gentleman from Texas knows, without those volumes to consult about the various matters embraced in this bill.

Mr. REAGAN. I understand the difficulty to which the gentleman from New York refers. I know there is a difficulty, but it is not so bad as he supposes. The reports of the engineers have not, as I understand, been delivered generally in the folding-room. The committee obtained advance copies without the index, and made an index of their own on which they have acted. We had the estimates as stated in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury with the reports of the engineers in the two volumes without index. We have indexed them for ourselves, and as to any case that is desired to be referred to we can give the report. It is also to be remembered that in addition to these reports quite a number of supplementary reports, covering perhaps five millions of dollars of estimates, have come to the committee since those reports were handed to us.

While the House will, as I understand, labor under the disadvantage of not having these reports, we can give the report and estimate for any item in the bill from the reports which we have and which we have indexed for ourselves. It may be that these reports have reached the document-room; I have not sent there for them. I would suggest to gentlemen that they send to the document-room and see if the reports are not there.

Mr. CLYMER. They are not there. I have sent there repeatedly for them, and have also sent to the Senate document-room. I have made every effort to obtain this information and all the avenues have been closed.

Mr. COX. And so have I. I would suggest to the gentleman that he now allow this committee to rise and let this bill go over until to-morrow and not compel us to go it blind, as we will have to do at this time.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish I could accommodate the gentleman from New York; but great public works in all parts of the country are now going forward, and a failure to pass this bill would arrest all those public works with infinite injury to the system of providing facilities for transportation. If we defer the passage of this bill by the House until it is too late for the Senate to act upon it, we will then be responsible for its defeat and for all the public injury that will result from that defeat. For that reason I do not feel at liberty to compromise the chances of passing this bill, though if it were in my power and if the business before the House permitted I would gladly afford every facility in the line suggested by the gentleman from New York.

I wish now to say a few words as to the make-up of this bill. I am not going to deal with the idle characterizations of this bill by gentlemen who know nothing about it. I stated to the House a few days ago that in the discharge of the duties assigned to us by the rules of the House we have taken up and considered the reports of the Engineer Bureau. As stated in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury submitted to us, those reports contain estimates for something over twenty-two million dollars. The Secretary of War, in a communication appended to those reports, recommends that the estimates of the Engineer Bureau be reduced to $7,500,000.

As I said a few moments ago, in addition to those reports, a considerable number of supplemental reports have been sent to us. The committee have taken up what we consider to be estimates of about twenty-six million dollars. We have reduced those estimates until we have reached a sum a little over ten million dollars.

I stated to the House on a former occasion that, independently of some amounts put upon this bill for the inauguration of permanent improvements of the Mississippi River, the amount recommended by this bill would be only two or three hundred thousand dollars more than the amount recommended by the bill reported to the House at the last session, and about four hundred thousand dollars less than the amount of that bill as passed at the last session. It will therefore be seen by the House that, allowing for the progress of the country and for the increased number of works provided for in the law of the last session, the committee have not been extravagant. On the contrary, they have well kept down the estimates, looking to what was appropriated last year, except that they have added certain items of appropriation for the improvement of the Mississippi River under the supervision of the Mississippi River commission.

I know it is habitual with a few gentlemen here to sneer at the efforts of the Committee on Commerce and by implication to impeach their integrity and honesty of purpose. No committee can be charged with labor more difficult. We have read the reports contained in these two volumes [holding up the volumes of the Engineer Report] and carefully considered all that they contain. We have also read a large number of supplemental reports in manuscript and in print. The committee of fifteen members have diligently debated and earnestly considered every item in this bill. I trust we have conscienciously tried to discharge our duty to the public, in view of securing facilities for the transportation of the commerce of this country for the benefit of the producers and the benefit of the consumers of the commodities so transported.

When we consider that there is transported annually in this country $30,000,000,000 of internal commerce, that the railroads of this country have cost to their builders five billions of money, that the annual repairs put upon those railroads by their owners, acting as individuals in their own interest, amount to about four hundred million dollars annually to accommodate the internal commerce of this country, and then when we consider that we have an internal water navigation in this country of over thirty thousand miles in extent, which furnishes the cheapest means of transportation and the only means of competition with railroads, and then consider that we ask Congress to give us only about eight million or ten million dollars to improve the water-ways of the country, to remove obstructions to and dangers of navigation, to cheapen freights, to cheapen insurance upon the vessels transporting that freight; when we consider that the Committee on Commerce have dealt with these facts and these problems in the interest of the American people, it amazes me that gentlemen will rise up here and talk about the extravagance of appropriating eight or ten million dollars annually for this purpose.

I have not seen the official statement, but I have seen a statement in the public prints, made on this floor a few years ago, that the Government of France, with a territory considerably less than the territory of the State of Texas, was giving $10,000,000 a year for the improvement of her rivers and harbors.

Mr. VALENTINE. On that point allow me to say——

Mr. REAGAN. One moment; let me finish my statement. Now the United States has a territory extending from ocean to ocean, and from the lakes to the Gulf, with fifty millions of people, with the largest resources from field and forest and mine of any country under the sun, with an active, energetic, commercial, prosperous people, and we are haggling here over the appropriation of $10,000,000 a year for the improvement of the facilities of water transportation in this country, when the owners of railroads, as a matter of private interest and investment, expend $400,000,000 every year simply for repairs, to accommodate this internal commerce, outside of their original investments.

Mr. Chairman, the carping, the higgling, the ill-natured, ungenerous flings made at the committee for the discharge of its duties to the country are to me beneath contempt. Mr. Chairman, it is doubtless true—indeed I know it to be true as a matter of fact—that the whole committee of fifteen did not agree to all the items in this bill. There were many items which some members of the committee believed ought to be in while others believed they ought to be out of the bill; as to other items some members believed a larger amount and some a smaller amount should be given. But after considering the reports, after taking in view the necessities of each case and balancing opinions, we put in such items as the committee could agree upon. We did this as the best we could do. And, Mr. Chairman, I doubt whether any committee ever labored more earnestly to mature a bill in the real interest of the country.

It was stated the other day that the fifteen members of the committee had taken care of themselves and their States at the expense of others. Is that statement true? Was it honestly made, or was it intended as an unjust and untrue appeal to the passions and prejudices of this House? Why, sir, take those States, take their commerce, take their population, take their representation on this floor, take the necessities of improving their waters with reference to the interest of the general commerce of the country, and it will be found that no more was done than justice and fairness required, if as much. I hope the gentleman from New York will not attack this bill because it does not contain in its appropriations as much for Kansas, for Nebraska, for Colorado, and for Nevada as for the great States of New York and Michigan on the one side and Florida and Texas on the other. If he would compel us to go by States, then indeed we must disregard the public interests, we must disregard principle and duty and right. We did not, I trust, allow ourselves to be governed by this consideration.

The gentleman chose to make a fling at me personally, as he always does upon this bill. I can generally afford to let his shafts fall harmless from a shield they can never penetrate, because of that sense of conscious rectitude which shrinks from no duty and is ready for every responsibility. The gentleman from New York says that "the gentleman from Texas" is on the committee, and that State gets $750,000 in the bill. Both propositions are true. But are the appropriations for Texas not consistent with right? Do they not harmonize with justice? Sir, that State would make some six States in territory equal to the State of New York. That State has the most extensive coast-line of any State in the Union, leaving out Michigan, California, and Florida, I believe. That State occupies such a position far inland on the Gulf of Mexico as to open water communication to a large body of country greater in extent than can be reached from any other seaboard in the Union. That State has more than a million and a half of its own population. It sends to market this year over one million bales of cotton, worth not less than $60,000,000, to say nothing of its cattle, its wheat, wool, hides, and other productions, and without reference to the return commerce. That State is struggling for such an outlet to the sea as will accommodate not only the commerce of its own people, but that of Western Arkansas, Western Louisiana, the Indian Territory, Kansas, New Mexico, and the northern States of the republic of Mexico. If any man who has a conscience will examine the bill, observing the size of that State, the extent of its commerce, involving interests important to other States—Iowa, Nebraska, and other States of the West as their shortest way to the sea—if any man making this examination does not reach the conclusion that the committee has been just, then I shall have some reason to doubt whether we have done right.

I have not time to go over the bill and to show that many of the States having no member on the committee are as fully provided for as others. Take the little State of Oregon, away in the Northwest, without a representative on the committee and with but one member on this floor. The provision in the bill for that State is larger in proportion to its population, its wealth, and its commerce than for any other single State in the Union. Take the State of Michigan, which has no member on the committee; it is fairly and justly provided for. Take also the State of Florida. These two States I mention as having a large water frontage. With no member upon the committee, they have fair, just, liberal provision made for them. So, also, take Tennessee and Alabama, and you will find that the same justice is done; but I cannot now pursue this line of remark.

I suggest these things because it seemed to me that the attempt to impeach the integrity of the committee, to enlist the passions of this House against the selfishness of the committee, was unjust and unfair, if it was not unparliamentary. I will make only a single remark in reference to the make-up of this bill. I have been engaged for six years upon that committee. I have met it in almost every meeting. I have read all its reports; I have studied every appropriation that has been recommended by it. Some that I have favored have been excluded from the bill, and some that I opposed have gone in. But, sir, the man who attempts to make up a bill that will please everybody has an exceedingly difficult task. To please this entire House would require (leaving out the territorial Delegates) just two hundred and ninety-three different bills—that is, one for each member.

The gentleman from Illinois asks me how much money. I am not dealing with that question now. But right here I propose to say this, that the very men who fight this bill because it contains $10,000,000 are the very men who appeal to us to put more into the bill and then vote against it because it does not contain a less sum. [Laughter.] That shows their inconsistency and I am not here to answer for them.

Mr. SPRINGER. How much has been applied for before the committee by members of the House and others?

Mr. REAGAN. It would be impossible for me to say. I will say to my friend from Illinois, however, that every member who came before the committee insisted that the particular work in which he was interested ought to have the entire appropriation asked for, that that was a special work of special interest and ought to have preference above all others, and ought to have the entire amount estimated for appropriated. And because we would not make the bill $26,000,000, the very same gentlemen vote against it as extravagant for containing $10,000,000.

And my economical and good friend from New York [Mr. COX] last year appealed to the committee to give a large sum for the improvement of Harlem River to give more sea-port accommodation to the great city of New York beside what it has in the East and Hudson Rivers. Now he objects to this bill on account of its want of economy.

I want to say this, that if this bill as reported from the committee could only receive the approbation of the House, while I know many will feel their disappointment, while I expect two-thirds of the members of the House, if not more than two-thirds, believe they have not got what they needed, still if we can take this limited sum instead of a larger sum that would satisfy them, and which, if granted, would increase the bill so many millions, it would save a drain on the Treasury that would shock the public conscience, and we would thereby be able to preserve the great public works now going on in the interest and for the protection of the navigation and commerce of the country. I trust members of this House will, when they come to vote on this subject, consider what the effect would be of the defeat of this bill, the damage that would ensue from arresting public works now in process of construction, the destruction of the present plants upon these great public works of improvement, compelling hereafter the Government to pay for new plants in place of those destroyed. Are we prepared, on a penny-wise and pound-foolish policy, to arrest the progress and check the career of this great land of ours, presenting now to the world an example of prosperity, of thrift, of commercial enterprise unequaled by the people of any other land?

I desire to say a word in reference to its action on this bill. I hope it may meet the sense of propriety and justice of this House to have such reasonable general debate on this bill as will enable its enemies to attack it and expose its weaknesses, if it has any, and that then, when that is done, we shall report the bill to the House and pass it as it is.

I merely make the suggestion in the interest of the entire country. For if when we are through with general debate we enter upon the process of amendment, I predict now that the bill will not stop short of fifteen or twenty millions of dollars, and that it will not, after you start the process of amendment, as equitably, as fairly, as equally distribute its benefits to all parts of the country and all the great interests as it does now, coming from the hands of fifteen committeemen who have devoted the greater part of this entire session to its consideration and preparation. But I do not care to occupy the floor longer myself.

Mr. DUNNELL. Let the gentleman reserve the remaining portion of his hour.

Mr. REAGAN. I reserve the balance of my time. How much have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. Thirty-five minutes.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope there will be an understanding by the committee to limit this general debate. If we are going to occupy two or three days in the discussion of this bill, from the temper of the House we will not be able to pass it in a week, and that will bring about an extra session without doubt. I am fighting an extra session. I trust the committee will limit this debate by common consent.

The CHAIRMAN. It cannot be limited except by common consent.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas seems to be laboring under the impression that he is put on trial here—that somebody has put him on trial for his patriotism, honesty, statesmanship, and economy. Nothing of the kind. Nobody ever called him dishonest. Nobody ever intimated that he was dishonest. All that was ever stated in that relation was, somehow or other, it was an extraordinary coincidence that the State of Texas got $750,000 under this bill and the gentleman was on the committee. [Laughter.] He rises here and admits that he does get $750,000 and that he is on the committee. He therefore pleads guilty to all I said.

The other gentlemen may not get so much. The ciphering which we did the other day was in a hurry. It was looked over by some friends on both sides. They understand how to handle slate and pencil, if not geography. But no man in this House, unless he has the knowledge almost of the Infinite, can ever tell, from reading this bill superficially, and without the aid of encyclopedias and geographies, engineer reports, and all sorts of documentary and scientific helps, how much of this money goes to one State or the other; but the gentlemen who made this ciphering did the best they could with their limited knowledge.

Mr. Chairman, my friend from Texas challenges us to examine these provisions. How can we examine them? Nobody but the committee has had custody of these engineer reports. They could not be had. We sought them in vain. When members sent even to the Commerce Committee to get copies, although the copies were on their tables, they were refused by their clerk.

How can we make a comparison or urgency for economy or fair-dealing in these matters in the absence of the data or estimates on which the appropriations are founded? "Let us examine it," says the gentleman. Where? How? Are we to take his say-so? Are we to submit to the ipse dixit of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] or from Virginia [Mr. BEALE] or of the other gentlemen upon the committee; and then must we vote? Must we?

Mr. Chairman, I did not come here to vote $10,000,000 in that way. The gentleman from Texas may criticise me if he will. He may say that my conduct here is beneath contempt. He may say what he pleases about me. He has not served as long here as I have and kept as stainless a record. I never was, even by intimation, hinted at as having pursued the interests of myself, of my district, of my State or my constituents in opposition to the general interests. And now——

Mr. REAGAN. Does the gentleman from New York by contrast mean to be understood as saying that I have done anything of the kind?

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Texas was defending himself——

Mr. REAGAN. I demand a reply to my question.

Mr. COX. When a man excuses himself he accuses himself.

Mr. REAGAN. I demand an answer. I want the gentleman from New York to state whether his remark is intended to reflect upon me as implying that I have done anything of the kind?

Mr. COX. When you are polite enough to take your seat and comply with the rules of decorum necessary for a parliamentary body I will take pleasure in answering your question, but not otherwise. I ask the Chairman to enforce the rule.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman has made a wanton——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is entitled to the floor.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman from New York does not choose to reply to my question in a satisfactory manner, and declines to disavow any such reflection as his words imply, I ask that his language be taken down; and I make the question of order upon it.

Mr. COX. I made no charge against the honesty of the gentleman from Texas in saying what I did. I deny that I have charged him with dishonesty. Summing up the provisions of this appropriation bill, I stated that the State of which he is a member was to receive under the terms of this bill $750,000, he being on the committee; but——

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York does not respond to my inquiry. He has referred to the fact that he has been a member of this House for a longer period than I have. He stated that he had preserved a stainless record; that he had never been charged, by implication even, with anything that looked to an improper or selfish motive in advancing personal interests at the expense of the general welfare, and I ask him the question now relative to that if he means to assert that I had done anything of the kind, as his preceding remarks would seem to indicate or imply.

Mr. COX. Now, my dearly beloved friend, if you will just take your seat I will answer your question as politely as I know how.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman is as polite a slanderer as I have ever heard, and he can utter his calumnies within the rule of parliamentary proceeding as well as any other man I have ever heard of; but I desire to have a reply to my question.

Mr. COX. I know that when the gentleman from Texas left this House years ago he left it firing a Parthian arrow and with unkindly feeling toward me—because I stood by the Union. [Derisive laughter and cries of "Oh!" "Oh!" on the democratic side.]

Mr. REAGAN. That is exactly the language that might be expected from a demagogue of that character.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is out of order.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman resorts from one calumny to another instead of answering the question I asked him. He will not have the magnanimity or the manhood to state his position, but simply flies from one calumny to another.

Mr. COX. Well, I do not think that I have uttered any serious calumny against the gentleman. But I seem to be unable to satisfy him of that fact, and therefore I let it go by as the idle wind, which I regard not.

Mr. Chairman, in pursuing a debate on a bill of this kind, reaching to the utmost limits of State and local demagogy, I know it is easier to float gently with the current than to endeavor to swim against it. I was referring to the position occupied by the gentleman from Texas in reference to it. I have made no charge of sweeping dishonesty against the gentleman. There are items in this bill that would subject it and the committee that framed it to criticism. I had, as I have said, occasion in the course of that discussion to refer to the position the gentleman from Texas occupied toward this bill as the chairman of the committee that framed it, and as managing it before this House. I do not say that the bill has been made up wrongfully so far as he is individually concerned.

I have scrupulously taken care to charge the gentleman only with this: that he is vigilant for his State, that he is a good local representative standing for his State, and that his colleagues on the committee are doing the same thing. Does the gentleman think to break me down in this debate with the sort of talk he has given to the House about calumny and contempt? Contempt! Why, as the man out West said on a similar occasion, "one cannot find words to express his language." Contempt from him to me! What have I ever done that he should look down upon me with contempt? The gentleman stated I have favored something in New York about the Harlem River. Why, I have voted against all these bills, all the time, with that river in them.

Mr. REAGAN. But the gentleman urged us to do what he would not do himself.

Mr. COX. I declare the gentleman from Texas does not know how to behave in parliamentary practice.

Mr. REAGAN. I know the truth hurts the gentleman sometimes, and I am inclined to tell him the truth when I have a chance.

Mr. COX. Truth cannot hurt any one who is honest and square, and I have been that on this bill and on every bill of this nature. I will not say anything more to the gentleman from Texas here; but if he will make an issue with me out of the House, I will use harpoons, and will then have the advantage of him. [Great laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen will please take their seats and observe order on the floor. The gentleman from New York will suspend until gentlemen take their seats. The Chair will endeavor to preserve order.

Mr. COX. Now, I see the gentleman from Texas is good humored, for I saw him smile along with the House; and now that the House is good tempered I desire, on my own motion, to recall one little thing I ought not perhaps to have said in this connection. I desire to say to the gentleman from Texas that I knew he came to Congress early as a friend of the Union. I knew him to be opposed to disunion; I knew that he accepted that as a last resort, and was almost the last man who went from this House. I have no reproach to give him for that. But being irritated by these perpetual and peculiar interruptions just now, I did remember a remark he made in leaving here, which I unhappily recalled, and for which I am sorry. [Applause.]

I say we cannot discuss this bill properly without the engineer and other reports. When the gentleman from Texas undertakes to challenge our attention to this bill, I ask why does he not postpone it till we have a chance to examine these matters more critically?

Mr. REAGAN. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman's vein of thought; and will do so only to the extent of saying that when on the occasion to which he refers long ago I said something not pleasant to him, I told him promptly it should go out of the RECORD. And it did go out. I did not wait to parley with him as he does with me.

Mr. COX. I thought from the gentleman's remarks about me that he wanted to review the old "unpleasantness." I do not want to do that.

Now, let us come to some of the States that are the beneficiaries in this bill. Take the State of West Virginia, whose Representative on the Committee on Commerce seems very active. I would like some one to tell me, I would like my friend from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] to tell me, how much tax West Virginia pays into the Federal Treasury. I believe she does not pay on the average more than $300,000 or $400,000 per year as her share. How much does she get as a largess from the Treasury for her improvements?

Look at page 681 of the report of the Chief of Engineers in regard to the improvement of one river, the great Kanawha, West Virginia. It is said here:

The object of the improvement is to give a constant navigable depth of at least seven feet throughout the whole of the Kanawha to its mouth at the Ohio River.

They undertake to do this by locks and dams. A statement is made as to the kind of dams and locks. And here is a statement of the amount expended June 30, 1880, the total amount being $868,680.32:

Lock 3 is near Point Creek, twenty-one and one-half miles above Charleston ferry. Locks 4 and 5 are respectively near Cabin Creek and Brownstown, fifteen and one-quarter and nine and one-eighth miles above Charleston Ferry. Dam 3 will create a pool extending as high as Cannelton, a very important point on the river, twenty-seven and one-half miles above Charleston ferry.

The balance available July 1, 1880, was $273,319.68. I do not know the amount appropriated in this bill for that special river; but the amount in the estimates for the Great Kanawha for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, is $350,000. The amount available at the end of the last fiscal year out of the appropriations was $583,225.76. The amount expended during the year ending July 1, 1880, was $309,906.08, leaving amount available July 1, 1880, as I have stated, $273,319.68.

But, sir, I cannot go into details, but I may print from this report.

Still I will say that the amount estimated as required for completing the existing project is $2,410,000, and the amount to be expended in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, is $350,000. This is as to one small river in this State.

So it is as to the Elk River in West Virginia. Sums have been expended there which I have not time to quote. This is a sample of hundreds of items in this bill, which we cannot possibly investigate without having before us the reports of engineers and past appropriations. Here is a great volume of hundreds of pages and without index, to which we have first had access. We are compelled to dive into it on five minutes' notice and pick out at a venture some samples, like this of Elk River. The engineer, always partial to these appropriations, on which his living depends, says of Elk River:

These operations were simple in character, consisting of the removal of such obstructions to navigation as rocks, snags, overhanging trees, and gravel shoals.

Then comes the report of the engineers, dated "United States Engineer Office, Baltimore, January 21, 1880:"

It is suggested that any new appropriation for Elk River be not restricted to certain portions as in the last case. The river needs improvement below the Big Sandy as well as above. Before the river can be considered properly prepared for the full development of the trade upon it, which the resources of the country will probably produce and maintain, some or all of the private mill-dams should certainly be removed or modified, (the expense need not be great,) and the miserable lock and dam near Charlestown should be removed as a nuisance and obstruction to navigation.

That is the work of removing these little mill-dams for mill sites or mill purposes in order to allow some little navigation. Oftentimes these appropriations are really for mill purposes and not navigation.

The unexpected cheapness and success, however, of the work of last season lead me to conclude that what remains can be done for very much less than the amount of that estimate, which was $100,000.

One hundred thousand! That is all; and for what?

Now turn again to this same Elk River, to the report to be found on page 692. The engineer says:

From Braxton Court House to the mouth of Big Sandy the traffic consists almost exclusively of logs floated in the river, of canoes and small flat-boats, carrying country produce down stream and returning with groceries, provisions, &c., of staves and hoop-poles.

Mr. ELLIS. What amount did the gentleman say was appropriated last year?

Mr. COX. I do not say myself. I am only reading from the report and what it says. I do not undertake to say anything. The gentleman can look at the report for himself. Hoop-poles is some of the produce floated on this magnificent river, sometimes "poled" down likely, as other cases herein recited. I give this only as a sample.

I never oppose an appropriation for such splendid streams as the Missouri and Mississippi, and for such harbors as are of proper federal magnitude. But I want to know if on this Elk River there is floated federal commerce in "canoes and small flat-boats, carrying country produce down stream, and returning with groceries, provisions, &c., of staves and hoop-poles." The engineer further says:

An iron-furnace exists near Strange Creek, from which iron has been brought down in flats. This furnace is being started again, and the parties interested are anxious for the improvement of the barge navigation.

I have not had time to look all through these matters. I pick up these things at haphazard here and there.

Again, in regard to Scuppernong River, in North Carolina, it is here recorded:

It was proposed to improve the navigation by dredging a canal through the bar at the mouth eighty feet wide and nine feet deep; to cut off points at places where abrupt bends occur in the upper river, and to take out a few stumps.

That is called a great national stream. We are asked to appropriate for it in a general bill for the improvement of our rivers and harbors. The bill is more generous than general.

Mr. YEATES. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. COX. Certainly.

Mr. YEATES. I desire to say that that river is nearly a mile wide at its mouth.

Mr. COX. No doubt.

Mr. YEATES. That is the fact.

Mr. COX. How did the stumps grow there?

A MEMBER. Stumps do not grow.

Mr. COX. I know that stumps do not grow, but it is proposed to improve the river by taking out "a few stumps." It is a small river within a single State, and does not come within my category for Federal appropriation. That is my point.

Mr. CLAFLIN. The Harlem River does.

Mr. COX. I did not vote for the Harlem River.

Mr. CLAFLIN. Did you not ask to have it put in the bill?

Mr. COX. I did not name any amount.

Mr. KENNA. I remember very distinctly——

Mr. COX. I will stand by all I have done. Harlem River makes New York City an island, and it needs improvement. I have never disfavored the improvement of the harbor of New Orleans, or Galveston, or Charleston, or any harbors at important points for our commerce. I never have and I never shall. Now look again at one of these appropriations, so unlike those at or near New York. The engineer says of it:

Those making use of Elk River for floating out logs from the head waters to the mouth report that the work of last season has been a great benefit to their interests, the stream in many places being in appearance a new water-course! Experience has shown that at certain points special work would be of benefit. * * * At Wolf Island the brush now covering the bar causes logs to lodge.

That is a great improvement. Because a little brush gets into the creek or stream, stopping saw-logs and other logs from going down, in rushes to the American Congress the Committee on Commerce and asks for money by the million to improve such insignificant rivers and streams, used to float logs which happen to catch in brush!

I may not now be able to interest anybody, perhaps, except the tax-payers, who have to bear these great outlays of expenditure upon such small and insignificant rivers.

The gentleman from Texas and the other gentlemen have hinted to me that I favored Harlem River. I was requested time and again to vote for an appropriation for that river, and would have liked to have helped it somewhat; but it was included with other things which I could not vote for. It was connected in bills which were being driven through this House without debate or amendment, as it was attempted to drive through this bill, under the whip and spur of the previous question, without any time for adequate debate.

I have never felt called upon, Mr. Chairman, even where my own State or city was involved, to vote other than "no" against these mixed appropriations. For that I am subjected to this criticism by the gentleman from Texas.

But, sir, I am happy to believe that the great body of the people and press of this country, at least the independent portion of them, will defend the Congressman who stands up stoutly against these wasteful inroads upon our exchequer for doubtful objects at best, and not in any case for large commercial purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has forty minutes remaining. To whom does he yield?

Mr. COX. I will first yield to my friend from Texas, [Mr. MILLS.]

Mr. MILLS. I want only ten minutes—not exceeding fifteen at any rate.

Mr. Chairman, I have been in Congress for eight years. I have voted for every river and harbor bill that has been reported to this House for its action. I voted for this bill the other day when it was moved to suspend the rules and pass it. I am an internal-improvement man. I am "broad gauge" on questions of that sort. I believe that it is the duty of this Government to remove all obstructions that it is possible for it to remove in the way of commerce seeking the markets of the world. I am not only in favor of opening harbors and removing obstructions to the movement of commerce, but I am in favor of improving the rivers—the small rivers and the large rivers. I remember the history of the Clyde River in Scotland, as once related on this floor by my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.] It was once a marsh. I do not know what depth of water it now has.

A MEMBER. Thirty feet.

Mr. MILLS. At any rate it is one of the great waters upon which the great vessels of England are built to-day. It brings immense revenue and immense prosperity to that country by fostering the wealth of that great industry.

Having said thus much, I place myself in a proper attitude to come before this House and ask that justice be done in amending the bill we are now considering, so as to make it serve the purposes I have indicated. I know that the committee in preparing these bills are prone to regard the estimates of the Engineer Department. I know they have largely followed those estimates in recommending this or the other work. But there is a consideration behind the estimates of the Engineer Department and paramount to them, and that consideration is the demands of the commerce to be benefited by the proposed improvement. What does it signify if the Engineer Department reports that it will cost $100,000 to remove the bar at the mouth of some stream and get one hundred feet of water, so as to open communication for one hundred miles into the interior, if contiguous to that stream there are no settlements; if the earth is not cultivated; if it is a swamp, or is the habitation of Indians? The object to be achieved by the expenditure of the public money of this country is to remove obstructions to the movement of our commerce—the surplus products of the labor of the American people; and in that object I fully sympathize.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when I look over the improvements put down to my State in this bill, it seems to me that I see a most flagrant departure from the principle on which such a bill should be framed. I will take the items as they come:

Improving Aransas Pass and Bay, up to Rockport and Corpus Christi, Texas, $80,000.

The remarks I propose to now make would perhaps be more appropriately made upon an amendment when the bill shall be read by paragraphs. But I would then be confined to five minutes, and I could not get through what I wish to present to the House. I therefore speak on the question now.

I want to ask my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, whether he remembers the amount of commerce that goes through Aransas Pass?

Mr. REAGAN. I could not state the exact amount now; but it is stated as very large.

Mr. MILLS. Not nearly so large as that which goes out of Galveston Bay?

Mr. REAGAN. Oh, no, sir; nothing like it.

Mr. MILLS. Not so large by one to nine?

Mr. REAGAN. I cannot say that; but it is not nearly so large. My friend will understand, however, that Aransas is a place at which it is sought to make a harbor down the coast which would accommodate a portion of country nearer to that point than to these other places. The object of the improvement is to try to secure a port to accommodate that commerce and serve that country.

Mr. MILLS. That is precisely the criticism I am making upon the bill—that we are trying to make harbors where harbors are not necessary—at least not necessary to the extent that the committee has provided. I am in favor of improving the harbor of Aransas, and will vote as much for it as the Representative from that district. I am in favor of improving all these harbors just as fast as we can do so. Now, let us take the next item:

Improving Pass Cavallo Inlet into Matagorda Bay, $60,000.

Now, how much commerce passes out of Pass Cavallo Inlet, and how much comes in there? A small amount I say; and the statement will not be denied.

Improving ship-channel, Galveston Bay, Texas, $50,000.
Improving Neches River, Texas, $3,000.
Improving Sabine Pass and Blue Buck Bar, Texas, $150,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it will not be denied, I think, by any gentleman who is familiar with the statistics of Texas that nine-tenths of the commerce of that State goes out and comes in by way of Galveston Bay.

Mr. REAGAN. My colleague will allow me to remind him, because I know he wants to be correct——

Mr. MILLS. Certainly I do.

Mr. REAGAN. That there are over one million bales of cotton entering into the commerce of our State, not half of which goes through Galveston Bay.

Mr. MILLS. My friend will understand that when I say "nine-tenths of the commerce," I mean the Gulf commerce; I do not mean the commerce going by rail to New Orleans and never touching the Gulf at all.

Mr. SAMFORD. Perhaps Galveston Harbor does not need so much improvement as these others.

Mr. MILLS. I am coming to that. But I say again that of all the commerce going out of the Gulf of Mexico, I am satisfied nine-tenths goes through Galveston Harbor.

Now, I have not had the opportunity to examine these statistics, and therefore I am going by my general information of our coast. Five hundred thousand bales of cotton go out of the Gulf of Mexico through the open gateway of Galveston. That 500,000 bales of cotton pass through the corporation, almost all of it, of the city of Houston to Galveston either by rail or water line. There is a water line almost without competition. It fixes its charges at what it pleases. The charge is one dollar on every bale of cotton from Houston to Galveston. Shipping people told the Committee on Commerce a few years ago they could take a cargo of coffee from Rio and deliver it at Houston for nearly the same amount they could deliver it at Galveston. They said they could take a cargo from Houston and deliver it at Liverpool for almost the same they could deliver it at Galveston.

It takes $1 a bale on the 500,000 bales which go out to market. These 500,000 bales are worth about $15,000,000. The whole of the commerce, foreign and domestic, which comes and goes through Galveston Bay was reported to the House by a colleague of mine in a former Congress, eight years ago, to be $60,000,000. Then if $15,000,000 of the $60,000,000 pays a tax, or if the people pay a tax of $500,000 on the $15,000,000, that is about $2,000,000 of tax they pay by not having the obstructions removed in Galveston Harbor and Galveston Bay in the ship-channel in order that this water line may compete with the railroads and thus reduce freights. I have been urging this House to hurry up the completion of that ship-channel so we should have thorough competition between the water-line and the railroad line, and obliterate all overcharge in freights between those two cities.

My friend on the Committee on Commerce has given two other points in that State, the two together having one-half of the commerce which goes through from Houston to Galveston, one $80,000 and the other $150,000, while it is reported by the engineer it will only take $140,000 to complete this ship-canal, and he only gives $50,000 for the purpose. Why, now, shall we hurry these other improvements when there is so little population and commerce about them, and defer this great work so necessary to reduce the expenses of our commerce as it goes to market?

Let us look at what I have had only the time to gather of our population from the new census. Eight or nine counties around Sabine Pass get $150,000 in this appropriation. In these eight or nine counties contiguous to that work the census of 1880 only shows 34,000 people. It is not my argument that we are proposing to improve water-ways to settle the country. I want to improve these water-ways for the purpose of protecting commerce where the lands are settled. I want to improve these water-ways in order to reduce the charges on the products of the laboring people who are contiguous to the works. I am going to vote for this bill. I have no captious fight to make against river and harbor improvements; but the point I make is that it is a bad bill in the respects which I have named. I will not do this injustice to the great interests of my State in that discrimination; but I would rather take that than get nothing at all.

But I want to come before this House and ask them not to take the advice of my colleague and hear all the objections which can be made patiently against this bill and then to go and vote down every amendment without reference to whether it is right or wrong. I do not come here as a guerrilla to fight this bill. I want it to pass and become a law. I lay my appeal to the men who believe in internal improvements as fast as possible to enable the people to send off the products of their labor and to invite prosperity to come to all their hearthstones. I believe in that, and every vote I have ever given since I have been a member of this House has been in faithful and loyal allegiance to that idea. Therefore I come to ask you to help me carry out that proposition by improving this bill and making it respond to that idea. I ask you to take a little more of the public money or change it from where it is not needed so much and put a little more on this ship-channel, and to hasten its completion in order that we may have the benefit of competition in freights and save our people this large taxation.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask the gentleman for a moment to reply to one point.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has thirty minutes remaining of his time.

Mr. COX. I think it in order to allow my friend from Texas five minutes in which to make his answer.

Mr. REAGAN. I sympathize with the wish of my friend from New York and would like to see the ship-channel in Galveston Bay completed. But I had the duty imposed upon me of looking to the whole State, of looking to the interests of every part of it; and it was due to every district of the State that I should act, if possible, with judicial impartiality. Now, then, he forgets that we are just commencing the work at Aransas, Brazos Santiago, and another point, where there has been no money expended until now, to provide harbors where railroads are being built to the Rio Grande to command the commerce of Northern Mexico and the Rio Grande Valley. He forgets that in the determination to get deep water at the port of Galveston we have already expended on that work a half million dollars, and that we are now proposing in this bill, in order to get deep water at Galveston, to give $250,000.

In addition to the $50,000 we propose to give to the ship-channel, we have also appropriated $25,000 for Buffalo Bayou above the ship-channel. And I think my friend is endangering the passage of the bill by making the sort of objections he has made here. I do not think he has fully considered the effect of it. Now, sir, other places have a little, such as it was believed could be given to them. It is true that none of them command such commerce as Galveston. None have received a fourth or perhaps a tenth such as Galveston.

My friend speaks of Sabine Pass. Why, sir, it is the outlet of the Sabine River, that waters the western part of Lousiana and the eastern part of Texas, navigable now by steamboats for three hundred and fifty miles. It is the outlet of the Angelina and Neches Rivers, navigable for three hundred miles more at this season of the year. It is an outlet for a country larger than the State of Maryland and nearly as large as the State of Ohio. There are now being made and have been for a year and more about seven hundred thousand feet of lumber and from seven hundred thousand to eight hundred thousand shingles a day, besides staves, at Orange and Beaumont. The commerce from these mills, as well as the commerce from this entire region drained by these two rivers, goes out through that pass and by one railroad passing Beaumont and Orange. And another fact which his studies do not seem to have familiarized him with, as the committee have done after long examination, is that with the very small appropriations heretofore made at Sabine Pass the depth of water has already been increased from eight to fifteen feet, the deepest entrance on the coast. Perhaps the gentleman is not aware of the fact that between the mouth of the Mississippi and the Rio Grande it is the only harbor that can be dredged out and remain serviceable which will not be filled with the fine, shifting sands brought in by the literal currents of the Gulf. The channel, which the engineer believes can be made for $200,000, when made will give then a depth of from twenty to twenty-two feet of water to accommodate the vast trade north of us with at least one good harbor; and I may also be permitted to state to my colleague that, if I am rightly advised by one of his friends, he expressed his willingness to support a two-hundred-thousand-dollar appropriation for this place.

Mr. MILLS. It is necessary that I should make some response to——

Mr. COX. I yield now five minutes to my colleague from New York.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have opposed by my vote all the river and harbor bills, save one, which have been under consideration during my service here. I voted for one under a misapprehension. [Laughter.] I have voted against all others in silence. But I believe the time has come now to call a halt in the present river and harbor methods. I am not opposed to liberal appropriations for our water-ways.

I do not believe $10,000,000 too much to provide for proper expenditures in that direction during the coming year. But I, in the name of those I represent, demand something to show for the money expended. After giving the subject such attention as it has been in my power to give it since the day before yesterday, I do not see how any conscientious members of this committee can justify themselves in supporting this bill. The Committee on Commerce have expended thirty millions, more or less, in the last five years. What have we to show? In my own State—and I am not going to find any fault with Texas or any other State—but I say, and I know what I am talking about, that some of the largest appropriations that have been made during my service here for my own State have been made by the special activities and for the special interests of land-owners and greedy speculators.

It is absurd for the gentleman from Texas, the chairman of this committee, for whose integrity and devotion to this subject no man shall exceed me in admiration, but it is simply absurd when we see what is going on in this House to describe this bill as anything else than a startling illustration of the present condition of our politics. I do not say party politics. I mean selfish personal politics. I want the chairman of the Committee on Commerce to name three men of his fifteen that can answer a question which I shall put to him. I even doubt whether he can answer it himself. I understood the gentleman, the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, to say that he had examined carefully every item in this bill. Now, turning over to the thirty-sixth page I discover one item set apart by itself in one single line—line 852—which puzzles my geography, and I doubt very much whether there is more than one man in the committee of fifteen, if there is one, who can explain it. The line reads as follows:

Improving Sumpawamus Inlet, New York, $5,000.

[Laughter.]

Now, I would like to know if the chairman of the Committee on Commerce himself can tell me where Sumpawamus Inlet in New York is, and what that particular $5,000 is for?

Mr. REAGAN. I can answer the gentleman if he will allow me. I will tell him that Sumpawamus Inlet is on East River just within the boundary of the upper part of the city of New York. It is for the improvement of that inlet, and I am sorry to find the gentleman from New York so ignorant of the geography of his own city.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I am very glad the gentleman thinks he knows exactly where Sumpawamus Inlet lies. He is mistaken, but never mind. I alluded to that for the purpose of getting something else in. [Laughter.] Now, I know a harbor in New York, Mr. Chairman—and I ask gentleman to listen to this as a just comment upon this unfair bill—I know a harbor in New York State where entered last year for several months during the summer three or four thousand people every day. There were six steamboats damaged during the summer in entering that harbor by running upon a rock. The rock is well known to every good pilot; but in dangerous times of the tide and of the wind, the skill of no pilot is equal to escape it. [Here the hammer fell.] I should like to have two minutes more.

Mr. COX. I yield my colleague one minute more.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Of the six steamboats, two were absolutely wrecked at the great peril of hundreds of lives, and four others were injured. The steamboat interest applied in vain to the Committee on Commerce, while Sumpawamus Inlet, which is not within the boundary of the city of New York nor on the East River, but on the south shore of Long Island, beyond Babylon, got $5,000.

Now I say a method of dividing up these $10,000,000 by which such a steamboat interest as I have referred to is absolutely ignored, while benefits are conferred upon comparatively trivial nooks of doubtful importance, such a method is intolerable; and the time has come to find a better way. Ten million dollars yearly are not enough to do this work for 50,000,000 people. A commission of character and responsibility should be authorized by Congress to attend to the waterways of this whole country. The work never can be wisely done by the present method. If persisted in we shall soon waste hundreds of millions, without accomplishing the end aimed at.

Mr. COX. How much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has thirteen minutes remaining.

Mr. COX. I yield half a minute to my colleague, [Mr. HUTCHINS.]

Mr. HUTCHINS. I wish merely to say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] that the case to which he has referred was not one for which an appropriation could be made until within the last three days. At the last session provision was made in the river and harbor bill for a survey of that harbor. The report has come in. The engineer has reported that, in his opinion, an appropriation of $40,000 should be made for that purpose. I hope the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN,] in the interest of commerce and of the people he represents, will see that that appropriation is made before the end of this Congress.

Mr. COX. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE.]

Mr. PAGE. I think I can say in five minutes all I wish to say on this bill. I am not here to say anything in opposition to the bill reported by the committee further than to criticise what, in my judgment, I believe to be an unfair distribution of the public money in the improvement of rivers and harbors. I have no doubt the committee did the best they could on the facts that were before them. No member of Congress was permitted to go before the committee to represent the interests of his State or district; or at least very few were so permitted. I made out to get a little time, not over five minutes, and that after the bill had already been passed upon, as I understand, by the committee.

But, Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak a few moments in behalf of the Pacific coast, which has no representative on the Committee on Commerce. There is but one member, I believe, upon that committee west of the Mississippi River. The State that I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor has less than $140,000 in this bill, while the Great Kanawha in the State of West Virginia has $200,000 appropriated. The great State of California, with a sea-coast extending many hundreds of miles, has less than $140,000 in this bill.

The Sacramento River, navigable for over two hundred and ten miles, on which the commerce of my State must go, has an appropriation of $30,000 only. I desire to call the attention of the thinking men of this House to the question whether these inaccuracies and injustices ought to be committed by the committee. I am not saying that this committee did not perhaps do the best they could with the light before them and in the brief time allotted to them to consider a great bill like this river and harbor bill. But I am here to say that the distribution of this money is unfair, and not according to equity in my judgment, to the great Pacific coast, where the wheat crop this year is rotting by the side of the railroad tracks for the want of transportation, or to the great State of Minnesota, which is perhaps producing the largest wheat crop that has ever been produced by any State, California being second. I do think a portion of the public money could be honestly expended in improving the great national highways, the rivers and harbors of the Pacific coast. And yet we are put off here with $140,000 or less.

I am not criticising the Great Kanawha, represented by my friend from West Virginia, [Mr. KENNA.] I am not saying that that appropriation ought not to have been made. But I am making the comparison between the Great Kanawha and the rivers and harbors of my own State.

Mr. O'NEILL. The gentleman is giving a thrust at the bill and is not conscious of it.

Mr. REAGAN rose.

Mr. PAGE. I do not yield. I do not know why any member of this committee should call me to task for saying a few words in behalf of the people I have the honor in part to represent on this floor.

Mr. O'NEILL. I did not call the gentleman to task for saying something on behalf of the people he represents. He is giving the bill a blow and he is unconscious of it.

Mr. PAGE. I came here to claim no favors from this House and base my demand simply on justice. If it is not justice I do not want a dollar appropriated by this committee or this House for the State of California. I find, on looking over this bill, here is an item for improving Broad Creek, in Delaware, $10,000; another for improving mouth of Duck Creek, Delaware, $3,000; and another for the improvement of another creek in Delaware, $3,500.

Now I am not complaining that this money may not be well expended for that purpose. But I am here to say that the Sacramento and the San Joaquin Rivers in my own State, over which the commerce of a great empire must go, deserves better treatment at the hands of this committee and of this House.

Simply because the Engineer Department in its recommendation failed to ask for a greater amount than $60,000, and because it asked for $300,000 for the Great Kanawha, therefore we are shut off and are informed by the Committee on Commerce that they have given us 40 per cent. of the estimates.

I believe that the Committee on Commerce when formed in the future should be constituted solely with reference to what the business interests and the commerce of the country demand. And, speaking for myself, should I ever have the pleasure to assist in the organization of another House, and in the election of its presiding officer, I shall vote for one who, in my judgment, will recognize that there is a country west of the Mississippi River that ought to be considered by this House. [Great applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] has five minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. COX. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS.]

Mr. MILLS. My colleague [Mr. REAGAN] in the closing sentences of his remarks a few minutes ago said that he had been informed that I had stated to a constituent of mine that I would favor an appropriation of $200,000 for Sabine Pass. The inference to be drawn from that, I suppose, is that I would state in private conversation to a gentleman that I was in favor of one thing, and then I would on the floor of the House of Representatives show myself in favor of a different thing. Sir, that is a blow beneath the belt.

I maintain on the floor of the House precisely what I have said in private conversation with that gentleman or with any other. And I was exceedingly unfortunate in making myself understood if I left the impression upon the mind of any gentleman that I was opposed to this bill or would vote against it. I have said repeatedly that I have voted for every river and harbor bill that has come before Congress since I have been a member. I voted for this bill the other day, and intend to vote for it again.

I will vote for this bill if you put in it $200,000 for Sabine Pass. I would be glad to have the committee put in $200,000 for Sabine Pass. I will vote for it if you put in $150,000 for Aransas Pass. I would much prefer to see a million dollars put in for the improvement of Galveston Harbor. The commerce of that city requires that such an appropriation should be made. The little appropriations we have hitherto made for Galveston Bar have proved utterly useless for removing the obstruction there. It should be a large appropriation.

I think our river and harbor bill, instead of being cut down and narrowed to little expenditures year by year, keeping these works on our hands for years, should provide for the expenditure of twenty or twenty-five millions of dollars annually for the next four or five years, to improve all our water-ways, so that our commerce can be sent to market without any obstruction.

Now, because I stated that I would vote for as much as $200,000 for Sabine Pass, does any gentleman on this floor understand that I would agree that the great work of improving Galveston Harbor shall have nothing, or only $50,000 of the appropriation made for the whole State of Texas? I tell you that nine-tenths of your Gulf commerce goes out of that gate-way. I am speaking in general terms, for I have not had time to obtain accurate figures.

I am in favor of a large appropriation for every work that is necessary for the improvement of the water-ways of our country—all of them—and of larger appropriations than we now get. Therefore I do not want anybody in this House to understand that, because I want an equal distribution, in proportion to the demands of commerce, of the money assigned to my State, I am opposed to anybody else getting any; that I am pursuing a dog-in-the-manger policy; that I would refuse all appropriations because I cannot get the committee to give the necessary amount of money for the works I am more immediately interested in. Not at all. [Here the hammer fell.] I move that the committee now rise and report this bill to the House for further debate.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio, rose.

Mr. COVERT. I understood the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] to yield to me for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has no time to yield.

Mr. MILLS. I will yield it if the Chair will lend it to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] has submitted a motion that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ATKINS. Did not the gentleman from Texas move that the committee rise for purposes of debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not so understand the motion.

Mr. MILLS. I made the motion that the committee rise, in order that we might by to-morrow obtain more facts for the intelligent consideration of this bill.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope the committee will not now rise; it is not yet three o'clock.

The motion of Mr. MILLS was not agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I yield two minutes of my time to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COVERT.]

Mr. COVERT. I was in my committee-room until this moment, and therefore did not have the privilege of hearing the remarks of my distinguished colleague [Mr. CHITTENDEN] with reference to one item in this river and harbor bill, an item affecting my district.

Now if my distinguished colleague would devote some part of his summer journeyings to beautiful and healthful Long Island, instead of being so disloyal to his State as to confine his summer pilgrimages to staid and sober Connecticut, he would be in the position occupied by my distinguished friend from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON,] and would understand fully the location of the improvement in question and the pressing need which exists for that improvement.

Mr. ROBESON. That statement is correct. I am entirely familiar with the locality and its needs.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. What is the locality?

Mr. COVERT. It is an inlet on Long Island—Sumpawamus Inlet. I desire to say in the very brief time I have that Long Island is very peculiarly situated with reference to her claims for consideration in this annual river and harbor appropriation bill. Stretching from one end of the island to the other are innumerable bays, harbors, and coves, forming and furnishing harbors of refuge for the myriads of vessels that have occasion to make transit along that, at seasons, somewhat dangerous and treacherous coast. This inlet is the only medium of communication between a number of large and thriving villages and towns and the great South Bay. I assume that my colleague's ignorance of local geography is not so great but that he has heard at least of this latter body of water which floats upon its broad bosom thousands of sail and contributes in large proportion to the commerce of the country and of the whole country.

This inlet has become almost impassable. There is at the point named a very considerable body of people, largely engaged in trade and commerce. It is estimated that a population of over five thousand is directly interested in this proposed improvement, doing an annual business of $500,000 according to the official report of the Engineer Department; and these people are now debarred from any connection with the great water-way I have mentioned. If the local interests which are affected were fairly subject of discussion here, I might add that the citizens of the locality are entirely at the mercy of a railroad corporation so far as the carriage of freight and produce is concerned. It is, however, upon the broader and larger ground that the demands of general commerce require this improvement that I rest this claim. Long Island has an area large enough in itself for the formation of a sovereign State, and it is not therefore remarkable perhaps that my colleague did not know the exact locality of this proposed improvement. If he knew the locality and its people as I know them; if he knew the wants of that people in this regard as I have learned to know them; if he knew as I know the pressing necessity of this improvement, my public-spirited colleague would, I am sure, be the last gentleman on this floor to adversely criticise, or in any way oppose this item in the pending bill.

Mr. ROBESON. That region supplies New York with fish and oysters. I have seen five hundred sail there on a single day.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, this discussion has developed the fact that very few members of this committee are satisfied with this bill, from which I argue that the bill must be a very fair, judicious, and proper measure. Members seem to find no other fault with it than that in the appropriations their particular localities are not sufficiently provided for. Now, if the committee has succeeded, not in pleasing any one locality specially, but in making all feel that they ought to have more, it is a good indication that the bill is pretty nearly right. The committee in the course of its labors was compelled from necessity, as well as from propriety, to regard the reports of the Engineer Department, approved by the Secretary of War, as the proper basis upon which to make appropriations for the various works recommended by those reports. They have done so; and if in certain localities the appropriations are not as large as may be desired, it is not the fault of the committee. In distributing the appropriations they have endeavored to be fair and equitable, and I believe, so far as possible, they have succeeded. The gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] complains that the Sacramento River has received only $30,000 and the San Joaquin only $20,000. I beg to say to him that the Engineer Department recommended $60,000 as the amount that could advantageously be used the coming year on the Sacramento and $40,000 as a suitable appropriation for the San Joaquin. The committee in its liberality, considering the necessities and claims of the Pacific coast, give each of these rivers one-half the amount recommended, which was better than they did for seven-eighths of all the improvements recommended in the bill.

Mr. Speaker, this appropriation bill has been prepared with great care by the Committee on Commerce. Each item in it has received separate consideration by the committee. The detailed reports of the engineer in charge of each work, as well as the approval and recommendation of the board of engineers and the Secretary of War, have been carefully read—in all about three thousand pages. The committee, availing itself of all means of reliable information, has made this bill as fair and as equal in all its provisions as was possible, and with two or three exceptions no appropriation has been made for work not recommended by the Engineer Department and Secretary of War. Some of the streams appropriated for are comparatively small, but all of them navigable, and are important as a means of water communication to the localities through which they run, and are all tributaries to the larger rivers and lakes which form the connecting links in the great water lines for transportation to the seaboard.

The whole amount recommended by the Engineer Department for the improvement of rivers and harbors, numbering about three hundred and fifty in all, was in the neighborhood of twenty-six million dollars; and the Secretary of War, while approving the general recommendation, cut down the amount to about one-third in gross. The committee has tried to keep within this recommendation. The larger works of more pressing importance have been granted a little more than the average, and those of less importance, in some cases, have been allowed a little less; so that the average has been not much above the one-third indicated. The pending bill gives to the general appropriations about eight million four hundred thousand dollars, and the extraordinary amounts appropriated for the Lower and Upper Mississippi increases it to a little over ten million dollars.

I have no time nor is this the place to enter into a discussion as to the importance, advantage, or necessity of this appropriation for river and harbor improvements. I assume that to be admitted. I can say, however, that the opposition to the proper expenditure of money for these purposes has gradually lessened until the cheap notoriety and imaginary popularity gained by violent opposition to this river and harbor appropriation has about passed away. A strong, healthy sentiment now prevails throughout the country, and it is one that demands reasonable and judicious expenditures of money for the improvement of our water-ways, and such an improvement as will secure to us connecting lines of water communication in every possible direction and bring about the cheap transportation to the seaboard of the commerce of the Western and inland States. If this course be followed hereafter I have no hesitation in saying that it will afford the most effective regulator of the prices of freights, and the railroads, which might otherwise combine to charge exorbitant rates, will be held in check and restrained within reasonable limits. Viewing it from this stand-point I doubt whether the same amount of appropriation for any other purpose would result in so great general advantage both to the producer and the consumer. Considering the number of objects appropriated for, I think the amount of this bill is not too large; and the only question for us to determine is whether it is fairly and judiciously appropriated. On this point I have no doubts myself, and commend the bill to the support of the House.

Mr. Speaker, the opposition to this bill comes more from what has been left out of it than what it contains. If my genial and always brilliant friend from New York [Mr. COX] would study the bill a little more closely, he would be favorably impressed with its fairness and strong claims to his support. But he would not be happy if he did not have his annual tilt at the river and harbor bill, and his criticisms are at least entertaining if not instructive. I do not believe he expects to defeat the bill, and would feel badly were it to fail. He relies on men outside of New York to protect the magnificent harbors of the great commercial metropolis of the nation. The Committee on Commerce, in response to the earnest petitions of the Chamber of Commerce and the shipping interests of New York, have made fair appropriations in this bill for this purpose. It therefore comes with a bad grace from the gentleman from New York to attempt to defeat a bill which so largely benefits the city he has the honor in part to represent.

I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. HUMPHREY.]

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. Chairman, the whole opposition that has developed to this bill since it came before the House and before the Committee of the Whole seems to arise from the fact that the localities represented by the gentlemen opposing it have not received the full amount which they claim should be appropriated. But, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word in reply to what seems to be an unjust criticism by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] upon my colleague, [Mr. DEUSTER.] I wish to say that Superior Bay is one of the finest harbors in the world, a harbor which when sufficiently developed will open an empire in the far West and bring to its shores that tidal-wave of commerce that will go to the countries of the East. Yet for that harbor this bill makes an appropriation of only $5,000, while the harbor at Duluth has an appropriation of $25,000.

I say that the criticism of the gentleman from New York was unjust to my colleague, who has secured only $5,000 for one of the finest harbors in the world, where twenty-five years hence there may be a city of two hundred or two hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants—a situation which has as grand prospects as Chicago and the central cities had twenty-five or thirty years ago. I speak of this because Wisconsin is almost surrounded by water. She is surrounded upon the west by the Mississippi and on the north and east by Lake Superior and Lake Michigan. Yet the appropriations which she receives in this bill are not equal to those which she received in former years when the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers engaged the whole attention of that western country.

Though gentlemen may complain that in some instances appropriations are not put in places where they are most needed, yet so far as Wisconsin is concerned not one dollar has been given improperly; for the proposed expenditure in that State will greatly benefit the whole commerce of the United States. The Mississippi is not an inland river; like Lake Michigan and Lake Superior, it belongs to the whole of this continental country; and every dollar of the appropriations for Wisconsin goes to the Mississippi and its tributaries, and to Lakes Michigan and Superior.

It is a well-known fact that this committee is selected with reference to the river and harbor interests being properly represented thereon. Consequently, in properly estimating the wants of the country in this regard, the committee should make such appropriations as are most needed and without regard to locality; and I believe they have tried to do so.

Furthermore, I desire to say that the people of the great West have not and never had to my knowledge, and I know they have not for four years past, a sufficient amount of appropriation to develope that commerce which is destined to add immeasurably to the wealth of this country. And in connection with this I desire to add one word in regard to what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] stated in the course of his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I desire to say only one word in addition.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I desire to say, last spring 5,000 bales of cotton were shipped from Texas to New Orleans by way of Saint Louis, and that very fact shows that the remarks of the gentleman from Texas were perfectly just and proper. If the rivers and harbors of that great country were opened up to navigation and commerce by proper improvements, the trade between Texas and New Orleans would go directly and not the roundabout way of Saint Louis.

Last May the steamer Jo Howard left Saint Louis with 2,700 tons of freight, and Memphis with 3,100 tons, on her decks, for New Orleans, among which was eight hundred bales of the consignment of five thousand bales I have spoken of from Texas to New Orleans. The fact is, Mr. Chairman, the producing classes in this country are to reap the great benefit from these improvements, and this is as it should be.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I yield for ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I suppose there is no member of this committee who can vote for this bill or against it having less personal interest either for himself or his constituents, so far as the direct expenditure of the money herein appropriated is concerned, than myself. One hundred and thirty miles north upon the lake at Chicago is the nearest point to the section in which I reside that one dollar of the money appropriated by this bill will be expended. Heretofore in my service in this House, while I have always favored the improvement of rivers and harbors, I have contented myself with voting against the river and harbor appropriation bill because in my judgment, while many good appropriations were made, many that were not good were also made. Upon an examination of this bill, however, my judgment was and is still that this is the best river and harbor appropriation bill which has been reported to the House of Representatives since I have had the honor to be a member of the same.

I favor the improvement of the great rivers, lakes, and harbors of the country, because to my mind such improvements will do much to cheapen the freight charges in our internal commerce. When I take up the report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, I find our foreign commerce last year amounted in round numbers to $1,613,000,000. We are there told that this is only the one-twentieth part of the commerce which we carry on between the States, or what is called internal commerce. Multiply $1,600,000,000 by twenty, and you will get some faint idea of the necessities for means of transportation both by rail and water. On reading the same report, I find that in 1870 the exports from the great West to foreign countries of breadstuffs and provisions amounted to $107,000,000. In 1880 these exports reached $441,000,000, an increase of fourfold in ten years. Multiply $441,000,000 by twenty, and you will have some faint idea of the demands of the great West embraced between the Rocky and Alleghany Mountains for transportation of its products.

In this same report will be discovered the fact that the charge for freight is now one-half less than it was ten years ago. In other words, freights in 1870—ten years ago—were twice as much as they were last year or are now on the average. This decrease of the freight charge explains why this great trade and great production have increased so largely in the last ten years. Also let it be remembered that over 82 per cent. of our enormous exports are agricultural products alone.

When the ice closes up the water-ways the railroad freight rate is increased from 25 to 100 per cent. How can this be remedied? I know of no effectual or permanent remedy except by building up competition. If we can develop reliable water transportation which does not close in the winter, that reaches into the heart of the grain-producing section of this country, then we have, indeed, found a means of transportation which will afford competition, not during the summer and fall months, but during the whole year, upon the Mississippi River and some of its tributaries. From Cairo south navigation is always open. At Cairo we have the very heart of the grain-producing district of this country.

Mr. SAPP. Oh, no.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The gentleman says, oh, no. If you choose you may extend it to Iowa. Yet I say practically, however, you have there the heart of the grain-producing country at Cairo. I do not mean just about Cairo, but in that section is somewhere near the heart of it. But, be that as it may, practically it brings us a thousand miles nearer the sea in the West for transportation of our products if the Mississippi River can be kept open with a good channel. That is what is desired.

Mr. SAPP. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I cannot just now, but I will do so later.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio has extended the time to fifteen minutes.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I will yield, then, if the gentleman will make it a question.

Mr. SAPP. I will make it a question, and it is this: the gentleman says he is in favor of the improvement of the great rivers. Now, the Missouri River is navigable for over three thousand miles and there is only $115,000 appropriated for that river. Is that justice?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I am glad the gentleman has asked the question, and from my recollection after examining this bill there is much more appropriated for the Missouri River than $115,000.

Mr. SAPP. Not a bit more for general purposes.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Three times that amount, I am told. But let that be as it may, after an examination of this bill I find it appropriates over four million dollars for the Mississippi and its tributaries, and that is far better than any other bill has provided since I have been a member of the House.

Perhaps the bill does not deal liberally enough with the Missouri. I won't say it does. Perhaps it is not sufficiently liberal with other great water courses. Yet it is far more liberal, I will state again, than any bill reported to this House since I have been a member of it. I have heard it objected by some that the appropriation for the Mississippi River is too large. Some gentlemen object to going to the headwaters and entering upon the reservoir-improvement system. I grant you it may be in the nature of experiment. The reports are in favor of it and the experiment is worth trying. Some, again, object to it by saying that, owing to the large appropriations for the Mississippi River, the effect of its expenditure will be to reclaim some of the bottom lands of that river. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand that to be the primary object of this appropriation. Such reclamation is only incidental to the improvement of the navigation of the river.

But I want to say right here and now, upon that point and others in connection with the Mississippi River, that gentlemen should recollect that it drains a great empire stretching from the Alleghanies to the Rocky Mountains, and I remind gentlemen that the determination that it should remain a free highway forever for the commerce of the vast region which it drains, had much to do with the successful prosecution of the late war, and for one I should thank God and rejoice if in the development of this great river in making a reliable channel from the Gulf to Cairo, and from Cairo on up, the same work which deepens and maintains the channel will also result in whole or part in the reclamation of the alluvial lands bordering upon that river.

The alluvial lands bordering upon the Mississippi from Cairo to the Gulf, from fifty to one hundred and fifty miles in width, if reclaimed and placed under cultivation, are sufficient to make an empire alone. Egypt with its Nile, at one time supporting the most magnificent civilization of the world, was insignificant in comparison. Sir, I hope to live to see sea-going vessels load at Cairo, in my own State, with the products of the West, and also the alluvial lands of the Mississippi in successful cultivation. The next decade will see the public lands fitted for agriculture in the United States taken up and settled, and I have no doubt the next twenty years will see the tide of immigration following down the Mississippi, making that country a garden which is in great part now an unreclaimed wilderness.

It is true, Mr. Chairman, that when you take this bill up and read it item by item you come now and then to a river or harbor which is appropriated for that you do not recognize. Perhaps if we had been better students of geography it would have been better for us. But I do know that a great committee of this House, numbering fifteen members, have had this under consideration in the preparation of this bill for weeks and months, while I have been busy in the preparation of such business as has been committed to my care. And so it is with the gentlemen on the forty-odd other committees of this House. No one man can seek to exhaust all of the business that comes before the House. I doubt if there is a gentleman within the sound of my voice competent to do more than keep track of the business of two or three committees of the House at the outside. If you legislate at all you must take somebody's recommendation in many instances. I desire to say that there is not a man present within hearing of my voice except some one upon this Commerce Committee who can in two or three months exhaust this bill. But because I do not understand every item that is recommended by this committee, and placed in this bill, is that any reason why I should withhold my support from the whole of it? Is that any reason why I should refuse to yield my assent for an appropriation that I know in general is legitimate and proper for the improvement of the great lakes of the country and for our rivers and harbors?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I yield now fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HENDERSON.]

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I did not propose to discuss this bill, and should not have made any remarks whatever but for the allusions of my friend from New York [Mr. COX] in his speech on last Monday. I feel it to be due to myself as a member of the Committee on Commerce to say that for the last two months I have labored more patiently and I think more faithfully as a member of that committee in the preparation of this bill, so as to present to the country a river and harbor bill just and fair as it can be made in all of its provisions, than I have ever done before in discharging any public duty in my life. And I now say to this committee, and to each and every member of it, that while there are provisions in this bill which have not met my approbation and do not now meet it, and while other provisions are left out which I desired to have incorporated in it, yet I believe it is a bill as fair and just in all its provisions as any fifteen men can make it.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] undertook to arraign the members of the Committee on Commerce by showing that it had been a mere grab-game with them; that they had taken especial care to provide for their own constituencies and the States in which they resided; and the gentleman went on to show what each member of the committee received, under the provisions of the bill, as his part of the public plunder; and wound up by saying that the Committee on Commerce have "piled up over five millions of dollars"—one-half of the entire appropriation—for themselves.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what are the facts? I want to call the attention of the committee and I would like to call the attention of the country to this fact in view of what has been said by that gentleman. This committee represents fifteen States of this Union. It represents New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Illinois, four of the most wealthy and most populous States of this Union. It represents largely more than one-half of the whole population of the country. The States represented by this committee have one hundred and eighty-two members on the floor of this House, and they have a population of 29,197,869 according to the last census. It represents States in which the great commercial cities of the country like New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, Boston, Baltimore, New Orleans, Saint Louis, Cincinnati, Pittsburgh, and Cleveland are situated.

And furthermore, Mr. Chairman, when you come to the commerce, when you come to the business of the country, when you come to the navigable waters, the sea-coast, the lakes, rivers, and harbors of the country, you find a much larger proportion in favor of the States represented by this committee than you do in population or in the number of Representatives on the floor of this House.

I would not, perhaps, Mr. Chairman, have said this much, but the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] alluding to myself, said that I came from an inland State with a lake, or a little touch of a lake, here and there. Did my friend intend to deceive the House when he made that assertion? Did he intend to deceive the country when he made that assertion, or was it simply the indulgence of a little poetic fancy? Illinois an inland State with a little touch of lake here and there! Illinois has five hundred miles of the Mississippi River, the noblest river in the world, on its western border; it has, I believe, about one hundred and sixty miles of the Ohio on its south and southeastern border; it has the Wabash also between Illinois and Indiana, and it has Lake Michigan on the northeast, with the city of Chicago and the immense commerce of that great city, which I think compares favorably with any other commercial city of the country. And it has the Illinois River running down through it, which is national in its character, because it connects the lakes of the north with the Gulf of the south, and its improvement is as national as any other work. When you come to look at the interest of Illinois, admitting the statement of my friend from New York to be correct, which I do not, that $912,000 are appropriated for Illinois, she does not get any more than she ought to have for her great commercial interests. I suppose in making up this estimate the gentleman figured largely on the appropriations for the Mississippi River, which is in the interest of the entire Northwest and of the South and, I may say, of every portion of this great country of ours.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX. I wish to say the calculation for Illinois and other States which I have made was made in the first instance by the gentleman on the other side from Iowa, a man who understands arithmetic and geography.

Mr. HENDERSON. It was some one that did not understand exactly all the facts, or else he is a better figurer than I am.

Mr. COX. I would like the gentleman from Illinois to confer with that gentleman and make the corrections accordingly.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I made the calculations and am responsible for them. They are correct, too.

Mr. HENDERSON. The gentleman cannot make it out by any correct figuring. You may take the half of what is appropriated for the Mississippi River, which is not in the special interest of Illinois in any sense of the word, and you will fall short, in my opinion. I have here a statement of the population of each one of the States represented on the Committee on Commerce and of the number of Representatives to which each of said States is entitled. It is as follows:

| State. | Population. | Representation. |
|---|---|---|
| New York | 5,083,810 | 33 |
| Pennsylvania | 4,282,786 | 27 |
| Ohio | 3,198,239 | 20 |
| Illinois | 3,078,769 | 19 |
| Massachusetts | 1,783,012 | 11 |
| Connecticut | 622,683 | 4 |
| Virginia | 1,512,806 | 9 |
| Texas | 1,592,574 | 6 |
| Louisiana | 940,103 | 6 |
| Missouri | 2,168,804 | 13 |
| Maryland | 934,632 | 6 |
| Wisconsin | 1,315,480 | 8 |
| New Jersey | 1,130,983 | 7 |
| Kentucky | 1,648,708 | 10 |
| West Virginia | 618,480 | 3 |
| Total | 29,911,869 | 182 |

It has been said the Mississippi River has been too liberally provided for. There are ten States of this Union that lie bordering on the banks of the Mississippi River, and I have also a statement here of the population of those States; and they contain over fifteen millions of inhabitants, nearly one-third of the entire population of this country. The population of these ten States is as follows:

| | |
|---|---|
| Arkansas | 802,564 |
| Iowa | 1,624,620 |
| Kentucky | 1,648,708 |
| Louisiana | 940,103 |
| Minnesota | 780,806 |
| Mississippi | 1,131,592 |
| Missouri | 2,168,804 |
| Wisconsin | 1,315,480 |
| Illinois | 3,078,769 |
| Tennessee | 1,542,463 |
| Total | 15,023,909 |

Again, Mr. Chairman, there are the tributaries of the Mississippi River, which run along the borders or through States like Ohio, Pennsylvania, Indiana, Kansas, and Nebraska, States which are deeply interested in the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River. So, Mr. Chairman, when you come to consider the population and wealth and the business and the commerce of all those States interested in the Mississippi River, I have no hesitation in saying that the Mississippi River has not been too liberally provided for. No, sir, the amount should have been larger.

I will say again, in conclusion, for I do not desire to occupy the attention of the committee long, that in my opinion this bill is as fair and just as fifteen members representing different sections of the country could make it, and to all parts of the country. I confess I have been unable to meet objections sometimes made on the part of some members. They say, "You are willing to have us vote millions of dollars for your more magnificent rivers and harbors, to promote your more important and larger commercial interests; but if we want a few thousand dollars to take out snags and rocks and remove the sand-bars from such rivers as we have, you think we are not entitled to anything, while you ask us to vote these larger sums for your greater and more important works." When that objection is made I find it a hard one to answer always. But, Mr. Chairman, I believe in internal improvements. I say here to-day there is nothing of greater interest to this country than the improvements of our navigable waters. There is nothing which will more certainly promote the prosperity of the people of this great country than the improvement of our navigable waters so as to give the people cheaper transportation. And I am disposed, Mr. Chairman, to be liberal wherever our liberality will tend to build up and develop the industries and resources, the commerce and business of the country.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HENDERSON. I will, if I have time.

Mr. COX. I wish to ask if there is any appropriation in this bill for the Galena River?

Mr. HENDERSON. There is, sir.

Mr. COX. How much?

Mr. HENDERSON. There is an appropriation of $12,000.

Mr. COX. That is in your district?

Mr. HENDERSON. No, sir; it is not in my district, nor in a hundred miles of it, I think.

Mr. COX. How much is the commerce on the Galena River?

Mr. HENDERSON. I cannot tell you, sir, at this time.

Mr. COX. No?

Mr. HENDERSON. That is a work which was commenced before I had the honor of being a member of the Committee on Commerce; and the appropriation referred to is for the purpose of continuing the improvement. It was not particularly urged by me.

Mr. COX. How long a time will it be before the work of improving that river is completed?

Mr. HENDERSON. The estimates are at the gentleman's command, and he can examine them for himself. If he had examined them as carefully as he ought to have done he would not be laboring under the misapprehension he is now.

Mr. COX. I could not get the reports, or I would have done so.

Mr. HENDERSON. But, Mr. Chairman, I must conclude. My time is up. I think it would be a calamity to the country if this bill should fail and work should be suspended on all our public works. But I have no special interest in the passage of this bill more than other members of the House, nor have I any pride in its passage. I believe the passage of the bill to be in the interest of the entire country. I know it to be in the interest of the great Northwest, and I trust members from that section will carefully consider the provisions of the bill, and the results to follow the failure of its passage, before voting against it. But if it fails, I shall have the satisfaction of knowing that I have at least endeavored to discharge my duty in connection with this bill earnestly and faithfully, and that I am not responsible for any evil consequences which may result from the failure to pass it.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I now yield two or three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HAWK.]

Mr. HAWK. I thank the gentleman from Ohio for this courtesy. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] seems to be very desirous that some explanation be given with reference to the improvement of the Galena River. I have the honor to represent the district in which that improvement is being prosecuted. I desire to say for the information of the gentleman and of the House that this improvement was commenced after having been estimated for by the Chief of Engineers of the Army, under an appropriation made by the Forty-fourth Congress, I believe, possibly not until the Forty-fifth.

The project of the improvement of this river was adopted, I believe, in 1878, the object being to afford a channel one hundred feet in width and four feet deep at low water from the mouth of the river to the city of Galena. At that time some $30,000 were appropriated for the purpose of improving this river by dredging out the bars that had formed below the city so as to form a channel of the depth and width stated, thereby rendering the navigation of the stream feasible up to the wharves built in that city, and in which city there are extensive Government buildings as well. Then another appropriation of $12,000 was made, and also still another one of $12,000, making a total of appropriations to the present of $54,000, which several appropriations have always been below the amounts estimated for, and which have, I believe, been recommended unanimously by the Committee on Commerce. The amount of $12,000 is recommended by the committee to be appropriated this year also, which is far below the amount estimated for, the amount so estimated by the engineers being $50,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882.

This improvement is progressing rapidly, and it is thought by the engineers and parties interested that the appropriation here asked will complete the improvement so that the largest-sized steamers plying upon the Upper Mississippi River can reach the wharves of the city. Galena is a city of considerable commercial importance, being in the heart of the principal lead-mining district of that country. Other business than that of the shipment of lead is also transacted. There are furnaces for smelting lead and zinc there or in the vicinity, one or two heavy pork-packing establishments, besides several saw-mills. Important railroad interests center there, and a great deal of commerce will be transported on the river when this improvement is completed. Besides there are Government buildings there, and it seems to me that if the gentleman from New York well and thoroughly understood all the facts in the case he would be of the same mind as the Committee on Commerce.

For the information of the gentleman from New York and also of the House, I present some commercial statistics, all I have at hand, showing the shipments from Galena for one month of 1879: Hog products, 2,278,800 pounds; lead, 460,000 pounds; grain, 370,000 bushels; hides, 45,000 pounds; zinc ore, 74,400 pounds; lumber, 518,145 feet; general merchandise, 220,000 pounds.

I may be permitted to state further that this improvement has been now prosecuted almost to completion, and it appears to me, as I believe it would to any gentleman investigating the subject, that it would not be wise to stop the work at its present stage and lose the benefits accruing from the work done and the expenditure already made. It will certainly require but a short time and the expenditure of only a few thousand dollars more for the engineers to be able to report fully upon the wisdom of further expenditure of money in this improvement, in the success of which the people of that section of country feel perfectly sanguine. The wisdom of the Committee on Commerce, having all the facts before them, should certainly not be lightly questioned, especially by those who have had but comparatively limited opportunity to fully and thoroughly consider the bottom facts upon which this bill in each of the several improvements for which appropriations have been recommended is founded.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. O'NEILL.]

Mr. O'NEILL. I want simply to correct the figures of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] who on Monday last made his annual speech against the river and harbor appropriation bill.

The gentleman who attended to his arithmetical work was wrong and did injustice to the great State of Pennsylvania and the adjoining States of New Jersey and Delaware. The total appropriations for those three States, or rather for the State of Pennsylvania, for the improvement of the Delaware and Schuylkill Rivers, and for the tributaries of the Delaware River flowing from the States of New Jersey and Delaware, and for the State of Pennsylvania in connection with its rivers in the western portion of the State, amount to $661,500, instead of the amount stated by the gentleman from New York, $474,000.

And I want to say in behalf of the State of Pennsylvania, which by the report of the Superintendent of the Census, has a population of 4,275,000 in round numbers, being second only to the State of New York, and with a river, the Delaware, capable of bearing upon it the commerce of the world, if this and future Congresses shall be as liberal in making appropriations as Congresses heretofore have been, I do not want to have it go out to the world that the State of Pennsylvania, and the States of New Jersey and Delaware bordering upon the Delaware River, have not as large appropriations in this bill as they really do have, that is $661,500. I do not want any injustice done to the Committee on Commerce. Let my friend from New York take that and swallow it.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. RUSSELL.]

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] has referred to me and the State of Massachusetts, which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor, in connection with the appropriations for Massachusetts in the river and harbor bill, criticising the amount appropriated for that State. The amount appropriated for its rivers, its long line of coast and important harbors, is $248,000; $100,000 of that amount is appropriated for the improvement of Boston Harbor, a harbor without sufficient depth of water to accommodate the deep-draught vessels that are now attempting to do business at this port. The products of the great West are now seeking an outlet at this harbor, and thousands of car-loads of grain and other cereals are being detained upon the tracks of the different roads leading to this point for want of sufficient accommodations for their reshipment.

I believe that this bill making appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors is an important and legitimate one, and no appropriation of money will bring a greater return to the people of this country than that made by this bill.

A very large proportion of all the money appropriated by Congress is raised by taxes imposed upon merchandise that is carried over these water-ways. It is true that a few streams, short rivers with long names, are to be improved by appropriations in this bill, but these small feeders bear the same relation to commerce that the small streams bear to a great river. The principal part of this bill is for the deepening of our important harbors and improving the navigation of our great rivers. There never was a greater demand for the improvement of the water courses of this country. Our immense surplus harvests are pressing to the seaboard and the great steamships are striving to take up and distribute these products among the markets of the world.

The small vessels of 1,000 and 2,000 tons burden, and that could easily enter our ports, are found to be too small to transport merchandise cheaply, and steamships of 4,000 and 5,000 tons are the new vehicles deemed necessary to cheapen transportation.

There seems to be a strong opposition to the bill from New York City, which has about the only harbor in the country of sufficient depth of water to float the largest ships. Boston, Baltimore, Philadelphia, and other ports of the country are asking for aid to deepen their harbors and water channels that they may successfully compete with their more favored rival.

Easy and convenient water transportation is the most convenient way to hold in check railroad charges, and the advantage of cheap transportation of cotton, lumber, grain, or coal in any section of the country is felt by the purchaser or consumer wherever he may be located; and gentlemen who criticise this bill on the theory that it has not been territorially equally distributed, without reference to the amount of commerce to be benefited and the facilities that shippers now have, fail to comprehend the whole spirit of river and harbor improvements.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I now yield three minutes to my friend from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL.]

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for this appropriation bill as it stands. It is quite likely that it might possibly be improved if the House would take upon itself the labor of going through with the bill in detail. I believe that the bill contains very much that should commend it to the entire House. One fact ought not to be forgotten, that the bill has been very largely increased in amount by the appropriations for the improvement of the Mississippi River. We ought to recollect that we now have in office a Mississippi River commission; and when the bill creating that commission was established it was announced here in the House by Representatives from the East as well as those from the South and West, that the country would be very ready to approve any appropriations that Congress might make in carrying out the recommendations of that commission. It is a fact that the commission has been at work for the last year with great intelligence and great thoroughness. Its recommendations are before the country, challenging its respect as they ought to challenge the respect of this House.

We must remember that this country of ours embraces a very large number of harbors and rivers which are to be improved; and when we consider, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENDERSON] has said, the magnitude of our interstate commerce, when we look at the extent of our products, and when we are confronted at the present time by the monopoly sought to be carried out by combinations of railroads, we may very justly consider whether it is not our duty to be quite liberal in opening up the water-ways of the country.

Now I had the honor to serve four years upon the Committee on Commerce, and an exceedingly interesting and important committee I know it to be—a committee that has very large claims upon our consideration. I know that this committee in getting up the present bill has expended eight or nine weeks of laborious attention to details; and so far as I have examined the measure, so far as I have compared it with the reports of the Engineer Department, it is to me a matter of wonder that with all the pressure coming from different delegations, with the large amounts demanded by the Mississippi River commission, a bill so just, so generous, and so well arranged has been presented to the House for its consideration.

Mr. Chairman, we ought not to forget that although the money thus appropriated may be paid out in some instances upon the improvement of a river or harbor that to-day may seem insignificant, yet that money goes into the hands of the laborers throughout the country. It is not money exported; it is not money burned; it is money expended among the people of our country.

Let me say further, that no man now here or who has heretofore been a member of this House has ever been confronted at the polls by his vote upon a river and harbor appropriation bill. The demagogue may misrepresent such a measure; the correspondent may talk of it as a stupendous fraud; but let any intelligent member of this House go through the report of the Engineer Department intelligently and laboriously, and he will come to the conclusion that we should say to this committee, "Well done."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio has only five minutes remaining.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I yield that time to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. KENNA.]

Mr. KENNA. Mr. Chairman, there is a good deal that I should like to say in reference to the pending bill. There is no bill which has been brought into this House, to which as one of the members of the House I have since my advent into Congress given more labor, or in which I have taken more interest, and I would have liked to say a word or two in regard to the observations of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] concerning the Elk River in my district. Upon a casual examination, which I apprehend he only could make with the particulars at hand of the report in relation to that river, the gentleman has, unintentionally I have no doubt, done great injustice to it; and I would not care to allude to it here but for the fact it has been remarked that the Elk is a sample by which a great many others may be measured. I desire to say in justice to myself, having presented that matter to the committee of this House, and having heretofore presented it to the House, that the river is navigable for steamboats, that it makes large shipments of iron-ore and vast shipments of lumber and other products and is really and truly a very important stream.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I said in the outset, there is a great deal I would like to say in respect to this bill, but there are other matters to come, other matters pressing upon our attention, the apportionment bill of my friend from New York, general appropriation bills and others of great public importance, and yielding to their pressure and to their greater demand, believing also this House is ready to vote on this bill, I give way to the gentleman from Texas to make such motion as he may see fit in respect to it.

Mr. REAGAN. I move the committee rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. THOMAS TURNER. I ask the gentleman from Texas to yield to me for a moment to respond to what has been charged about the water-ways of my State. As a member of the Committee on Commerce, it is due to me I should be permitted to say one word in behalf of that State that never heretofore has had anything. Give me five minutes. I do not wish to trespass upon the time of the House to any great length, but I hope that time will be yielded to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. ATKINS. I do hope, Mr. Chairman, that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce will give the gentleman from Kentucky a chance to be heard. He hardly ever claims the attention of the House, and he ought to have the opportunity.

Mr. THOMAS TURNER. I was promised such opportunity, and I hope it will not be denied to me. I am a member of the Committee on Commerce, and was promised an opportunity to be heard. I am entitled to it. [Cries of "Go on!"]

Mr. REAGAN. Very well, then, I will take the floor in my own right, and as the gentleman from Kentucky is a member of the Committee on Commerce, I will yield to him for five minutes.

Mr. COX. What becomes of the motion of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. ROBINSON. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROBINSON. I make the point that the gentleman from Texas having already occupied the floor cannot again take the floor in his own right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas when he took his seat reserved thirty-five minutes of his time which was remaining and there was no objection. The gentleman from Texas has control of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not think the committee should drive this down the throats of anybody.

Mr. THOMAS TURNER. The gentleman has yielded to me.

Mr. REAGAN. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky for five minutes. I withdraw the motion that the bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass and allow the gentleman five minutes. When he has concluded his remarks I shall then renew the motion and ask for a vote upon it.

Mr. THOMAS TURNER addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. REAGAN. I move that the committee now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. COX. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. MARSH. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will take notice of all of the questions of order and hear them in their order.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. I wish to know if it will be in order to offer an amendment when the committee rises?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair dislikes to rule in advance. If an amendment is offered the Chair will consider the propriety or impropriety of its consideration by the committee.

Mr. COX. I demand the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa proposes an amendment, as the Chair understands.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa. If the bill is open to amendment, I will offer an amendment.

Mr. COX. My point of order is that the bill has not been considered by paragraphs, for amendments, each paragraph being a section under the rule. I ask, therefore, the reading of the bill by paragraphs in order that it may be subject to amendment.

Mr. McLANE. Is that in order at this time?

Mr. CLYMER. I further submit that all points of order were reserved upon the bill, and unless it be read by paragraphs, somewhere or at some time, or at some stage of the bill, there will be no opportunity to make the points of order, and the bill cannot be reported to the House for passage until it goes through that process.

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to make another suggestion. It is within the power of the House to limit general debate or debate upon any paragraph or section, but not until the debate has been entered upon. Now, if the motion of the gentleman from Texas shall prevail, it is an attempt to put a limitation upon the debate in Committee of the Whole by the committee before the bill has been read or any section of it considered. I submit that is not in order for the committee or for the House.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentlemen have presented all their points of order, I desire to say this in response: the Committee of the Whole is the judge of when it has allowed debate upon a bill. If the committee determine to recommend the passage of a bill it is a technical compliance with the requirements of the rule, and it puts the subject out of the heat of debate and brings it directly before the House for a vote.

Mr. ACKLEN. I desire to say that, by unanimous consent, when we first went into Committee of the Whole this morning the reading of this bill was dispensed with.

Mr. COX. Not the reading by sections for amendment.

Mr. ACKLEN. The general reading of the bill was dispensed with by consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Louisiana that that was the first reading of the bill for information.

Mr. REAGAN. I insist upon my motion that the committee rise and recommend the bill to the House for its passage.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York makes the point and calls for the reading of the first paragraph of the bill for amendment, and the gentleman from Iowa announces that he has an amendment which he desires to offer.

Mr. REAGAN. They have not the floor to make the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that he had been informed of the fact that such a motion would probably be made, and has therefore examined the question. He was at first inclined to hold if no gentleman called for the reading of the bill, and no gentleman had offered an amendment or announced his purpose to do so, if the gentleman from Texas had made his motion to rise and report the bill, and if no such objection had been made the Chair would have entertained the motion. But the Chair cannot entertain that motion when the gentleman from Iowa desires to offer an amendment as he states, and the gentleman from New York demands the reading of the first paragraph of the bill when amendments may be offered.

Mr. REAGAN. I must appeal——

Mr. ROBINSON. General debate not having been closed I desire to take the floor for that purpose.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas appeals from the decision of the Chair. The Chair will be glad to submit the question to the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is there an appeal in the Committee of the Whole?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that when a gentleman upon the floor of the committee calls for the reading of the bill by paragraphs with a view to amending it, the Chair cannot entertain a motion that the committee rise and report the bill. That is the decision of the Chair from which the gentleman from Texas appeals.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] had obtained the floor before an appeal was taken from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think he should cut the gentleman off from an appeal because of that.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask the Chair to have the rule read which requires the bill to be read by paragraphs.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I do not rise to discuss the question on the appeal, but simply to inquire for information whether there is any rule requiring a bill in Committee of the Whole to be read by sections. If there is a rule of this House or any known parliamentary rule upon the subject to that effect, I should like the Chair to give it.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the common parliamentary law of the land that a bill is referred to the Committee of the Whole for the express purpose of considering and amending.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. The Chair has not answered my question. I want to know if there is any rule by which this committee is precluded from reporting the bill without reading it by sections.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no express rule, but the practice of this House which has existed for many years has been to allow amendments to be offered in Committee of the Whole. The old rule, Rule 107, as the gentleman will see by reference to the old edition of the rules, expressly provides that in Committee of the Whole the bill shall be read through by paragraphs or sections for debate and amendment. That clause of the rule is not contained in the new revision. But the revision contains in subdivision 5 of Rule XXIII this clause:

When general debate is closed by order of the House, any member shall be allowed five minutes to explain any amendment he may offer, after which the member who shall first obtain the floor shall be allowed to speak five minutes in opposition to it, and there shall be no further debate thereon.

Now the Chair thinks it is very clear that after the House has by an order closed general debate it would not be in the power of the Chair to entertain a motion that the committee rise and report a bill without giving every gentleman an opportunity to offer and discuss amendments. But the Chair was inclined to think that inasmuch as in this instance the House had not yet closed general debate and no amendment had been offered and no gentleman had asked for the reading of the bill by clauses, he could have entertained the motion, and he would undoubtedly have entertained the motion on that view of the case if the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. UPDEGRAFF] had not announced that he rose in his place with an amendment in his hand and said that he desired to offer it. Now the Chair does not see how this committee can prevent members from offering amendments. The committee can vote them down.

Mr. REAGAN. I now ask that the committee rise for the purpose of limiting debate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Have I the floor?

Mr. CLYMER. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I also desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The appeal from the decision of the Chair is pending.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I thought the gentleman from Texas had withdrawn his appeal.

Mr. REAGAN. I have not done so.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I thought he had virtually done so when he submitted another motion.

Mr. McLANE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland desire to discuss the appeal?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. My inquiry is whether an appeal from the decision of the Chair is debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. It has been the custom when an appeal was pending to allow brief statements.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Does not the rule forbid it?

The CHAIRMAN. The rule does not forbid it.

Mr. McLANE. As I understand, the Chair ruled against the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] that the Committee rise and report the bill. That was the motion pending when the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. UPDEGRAFF] notified the Chair he desired to offer an amendment, and when the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] called for the reading of the bill. There was then pending the motion of the gentleman from Texas. I submit to the Chair that he cannot entertain the amendment on the demand of the gentleman from Iowa, or the demand to have the bill read, without overruling the motion of the gentleman from Texas. I wish the appeal to be made upon that ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state distinctly what he decided. The Chair decided that in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union a motion to amend a bill has preference over a motion that the committee rise and report the bill to the House. That is all the Chair has decided, and from that decision the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] has appealed.

Mr. REAGAN. My motion being in first. The only thing I have to say upon that is this: no motion had been made to amend the bill, no point of order had been made; the bill had been debated for hours in Committee of the Whole. In that state of the case I moved that the committee rise and report the bill to the House and recommend its passage. Subsequently a point of order was made by the gentleman from New York and a proposition was made by the gentleman from Iowa to amend.

The CHAIRMAN. This is an entirely new question under the revision of the rules. The Chair hopes there will be order. It is a question which ought to be deliberately considered and decided.

Mr. REAGAN. The Chair could only entertain the point of order by taking me from the floor against the rules of the House for that purpose. The Chair could only hold that the amendment could be offered by taking me from the floor for that purpose when I had a motion pending.

I submit that there is no rule of this House requiring the bill to be read by sections in Committee of the Whole. If it was the judgment of the majority of the Committee of the Whole that the bill had been sufficiently considered, it seems to me the Chair would not disregard a pending motion that the committee rise and report the bill, and of its own motion entertain other motions for which there was no authority, in order to raise a question upon which to base an appeal.

I will state to the Chair, and I desire the House to hear it as well, that the Chair can only get the predicate laid for such a ruling by disregarding the pending motion and volunteering to insert two motions ahead of mine, after my motion had been made and without obtaining the consent of the committee. It seems to me that whatever the opinion of the Chair may be upon an abstract question, the Chair is not required to substitute motions in violation of the rules of the House, and insert them in spite of my pending motion, upon which to base a ruling of the kind made by the Chair. The Chair has already stated that he had reached the conclusion that if no motion to amend was made, and if no point of order was raised, he would recognize a motion that the committee rise and report this bill to the House. No such motion to amend had been made; no such point of order had been raised when I made a motion which put the matter in the category indicated by the Chair. And we cannot avoid the force of that category unless the Chair takes me from the floor in spite of my right to the floor, and inserts a motion for an amendment or a point of order raised by some member. I now yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to say one word, because the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] seems to labor under a misapprehension. The Chair did not take the gentleman from Texas off the floor, or permit any other gentleman to do so. When the gentleman had submitted his motion that the committee rise and report the bill, he had occupied the floor as long as the rule allowed him to occupy it, because that motion was not debatable. Then a gentleman on each side of the House arose and made other motions, and the Chair simply decided as to the priority of those motions under the rule.

Mr. COX. I call for the reading of clause 6 of Rule XXIII.

Mr. REAGAN. I have yielded to my friend from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. COX. I hope the gentleman will allow the rule to be read.

Mr. McLANE. Let it be read; I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read clause 6 of Rule XXIII.

The Clerk read as follows:

The House may, by the vote of a majority of the members present, at any time after the five minutes' debate has begun upon proposed amendments to any section or paragraph to a bill, close all debate upon such section or paragraph, or, at its election, upon the pending amendments only; but this shall not preclude further amendment, to be decided without debate.

Mr. McLANE. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] knows very well that the House has not closed general debate on this bill, and there is no question at all about the five minutes' debate. Therefore the rule which he has had read has no application to the present condition of business in this committee. We are now pursuing our debate, and the whole subject is under the control of the committee.

It is perfectly competent for this committee to rise and ask the House to fix the time for closing general debate, and it is equally competent for the committee—I am addressing the Chair in the hope of getting him to review his decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has nothing to do with this question. It is for the committee to determine it on the appeal from the decision of the Chair. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. McLANE. Those gentlemen who are opposed to the view I may take of this question owe me the courtesy to permit me to present my views to the committee. They are at perfect liberty to vote when the time comes for voting; but until that time comes they are under obligation to give me an opportunity to state why this committee ought not to sustain the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CHALMERS. Will the gentleman allow me to make a parliamentary inquiry, not to interfere with his speech?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLANE. I have no right to refuse to let the gentleman make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CHALMERS. What would be the ruling of the Chair upon a proposition at this time to strike out all after the enacting clause of this bill?

Mr. McLANE. That is not a parliamentary inquiry, it is only a hypothetical question.

Mr. CHALMERS. The gentleman does not understand me. I proposed to help him in his argument by asking him the question. If he does not want to accept my services——

Mr. McLANE. I do not want any question at all asked of the Chair as to what his decision would be in any hypothetical case. I desire to confine the attention of the Chair and of the committee to the issue made by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.]

That gentleman made a motion which I submit he had a perfect right under the rules of this House to make. I want to know where there is any rule of this House which forbids that motion being made at the time it was made? It is entirely competent for this committee to rise for the purpose of obtaining an order of the House to close debate. And it is equally competent for the committee to rise and report this bill for passage. The two motions are entirely distinct, and it is in the power of the committee to adopt either course it pleases.

If it does not desire to have this bill amended at all, it need not have it amended. What an extraordinary proposition it would be to say that if a majority of this committee are content with the bill as it stands, they are not at liberty to report it to the House! That is the issue. I assume that a majority of this committee are perfectly content with this bill. There are gentlemen here who are not content with it. I do not expect them to move that the committee rise and report the bill, or to vote for such a motion. Any gentleman who is not content with this bill would naturally vote against such a motion.

Mr. McMAHON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McLANE. Certainly.

Mr. McMAHON. If it be in the power of a majority of this committee at any time to rise and report this bill to the House, wherein does that differ from the demand for the previous question, the very thing which it is intended to avoid by going into the Committee of the Whole? It is not within the power of a majority of this committee to take a bill as a whole and report it to the House until there has been an opportunity to amend it?

Mr. McLANE. It is entirely supposable, and indeed it frequently happens, that we may have a motion the practical effect of which would be the same as a vote for the previous question. But the gentleman from Ohio, whose astuteness we all recognize, can very easily perceive that the previous question is necessary in the House in order to bring business to a conclusion, but it is not at all necessary in Committee of the Whole. Why? For the simple reason——

Mr. McMAHON. The gentleman will allow me to say that when you demand the previous question you compel the House to take the bill as a whole, without opportunity for amendment; whereas when the bill is in Committee of the Whole each individual member can shape it by offering amendments and by having a vote upon particular propositions.

Mr. McLANE. Provided a majority of the committee are not already content with the bill. But when the majority of the committee are content with the bill, then, according to the spirit of all parliamentary rules, (and you may find an analogy in every bill coming before the House,) the Committee of the Whole should have an opportunity to rise and report the bill.

Mr. COX. What, then, is the object of going into Committee of the Whole?

Mr. McLANE. If it is objected that in this way debate may be closed, I say that you have only to vote down the motion that the committee rise, and the debate goes on.

Mr. McMAHON. Suppose a gentleman takes the floor in Committee of the Whole, and at the expiration of his hour concludes that the majority is with him, and then moves to report the bill to the House, without giving anybody else a chance?

Mr. McLANE. Very well; he has the right to do that; and if the majority be not with him they may refuse to rise.

Mr. McMAHON. Then there is no difference practically between the demand for the previous question and this motion?

Mr. McLANE. The point which I submit to the Chair is this: there being no rule of this House which prevents the Committee of the Whole from reporting this bill favorably when it is satisfied with it, I want to know why the committee cannot make such a report?

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask the Committee of the Whole to bear with me for a few moments on this point of order. I have already been recognized as entitled to the floor in the general debate, and I do not wish to be understood as waiving my right in that particular when the consideration of the bill shall be resumed.

I am really astonished, if gentlemen will allow me to say so, that they should argue here to take all the vitality out of proceedings in Committee of the Whole by such subterfuge as this; and I think I use the word advisedly.

What is the object of the Committee of the Whole? That we may consider bills making appropriations of money in a place where we shall not be throttled with the previous question. Now, when we commit this bill to the Committee of the Whole, points of order are reserved upon it—reserved upon every paragraph in it. In what way has any gentleman up to this moment had an opportunity to present his point of order against any paragraph? If the gentleman from Texas can make this motion and enforce it, then all such points of order are useless; they can have no effect upon any paragraph of the bill.

Again, under Rule XXIII, in all its provisions, it is within the power of the House after debate has commenced upon the subject to limit the general debate. It is not within the power of the committee to do so; it is never done in committee except by unanimous consent. It would not have been in order for the gentleman from Texas to have moved to limit debate in the Committee of the Whole—not at all; and it is not within his power to do by indirection what he cannot do directly. He ought not then to seek, by a motion that the committee rise, to force the bill upon its passage and thereby cut off general debate.

Let me go further. We have a right to consider each paragraph in this and every other bill coming up in Committee of the Whole; we have a right to submit amendments, to present our points of order, to submit our views to the extent of five minutes pro and con. It is not within the power of the Committee of the Whole to stop debate even upon a paragraph until the committee has gone back to the House and such permission given.

A MEMBER. And then only on the pending paragraph.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then only upon the pending paragraph. When the committee resumes its sitting the succeeding paragraphs are still open to debate.

What a mountain of absurdity are gentlemen piling up here to plague themselves with in time to come! Are we never to go into Committee of the Whole except upon a river and harbor bill, which, as gentlemen say, the majority are now all ready to pass? Will gentlemen now overrule the decision of the Chair and thus erect a contrivance that shall plague them for all time to come? Is the power of this committee to be exercised to overrule a judgment which I submit commends itself to reason and is in accord with the practice of this House and of the Committee of the Whole ever since there was a Congress and there were any rules? I hope the gentlemen who are committed to this river and harbor bill will bide their time and not upset parliamentary law and wise procedure for the sake of gaining in five minutes what they feel competent to accomplish in perhaps half a day.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

Mr. REAGAN. I do not insist on a further count.

The CHAIRMAN. Other gentlemen demand there shall be a count.

Mr. REAGAN. I withdraw the appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Members on both sides of the House object.

Mr. ELAM. Then they will have to renew it themselves. Let them do so.

Mr. REAGAN. I have a right to withdraw it before it is decided.

Mr. SPRINGER. Not during a division of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee is dividing.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 152, noes 6.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. ROBINSON obtained the floor.

Mr. COX. I call for the reading of the bill.

Mr. REAGAN. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of limiting debate.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have the floor and do not yield for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks he ought to recognize the gentleman in charge of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. If I am recognized I will yield to the motion that the committee rise.

Mr. REAGAN. I make no compromises. If the gentleman from Massachusetts can take the control of the bill from me, let him do it.

Mr. ROBINSON. The gentleman has not charge of the general debate on this bill. He has charge of the bill and he has charge of the hour that belongs to him, but nobody takes away from him the floor by exercising the rights that belong to him as a member.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Massachusetts rose to address the committee in the general debate before this appeal was taken from the decision of the Chair. The Chair permitted the gentleman from Texas to take an appeal notwithstanding that fact. Now the gentleman from Massachusetts rises and resumes the floor and states he will take the floor, which the Chair thinks it is competent for him to do.

Mr. REAGAN. I move the committee rise for the purpose of limiting debate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Am I recognized?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair already recognized the gentleman and understands he has yielded to a motion to rise.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have the floor as against anybody.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands it, and when the committee resumes its sitting the gentleman will have the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not yield for that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman from Massachusetts stated that he would yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not yield for a motion that the committee rise to close debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The statement that the committee rise to close debate is, so far as this committee is concerned, simply a motion to rise.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Chairman, I will hold the floor.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. REAGAN. One moment.

Mr. ATKINS. I have the floor and I desire to make a statement.

Mr. REAGAN. How can I manage this bill if I am to be taken off the floor in this way.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman cannot bulldoze me. [Laughter.]

Mr. REAGAN. I have not tried to do so.

Mr. ATKINS. I have risen to a parliamentary inquiry, and I intend to make it if the Chair recognizes me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. ATKINS. I was going to inquire whether the Chair did not understand the gentleman from Massachusetts to yield the floor to the gentleman from Texas to make a motion that the committee rise?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did so understand and so announced.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope the gentleman from Texas will save his temper as against his friends. [Laughter.]

Mr. REAGAN. I will take that as it comes from one who always controls his temper. [Renewed laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, here is the hour of half past four o'clock, the usual hour of adjournment. The gentleman from Massachusetts took the floor from me, as I thought, wrongfully, but I yield to the decision of the Chair. He then consented to yield to a motion that the committee rise, he occupying the floor. When I make that motion at the usual time of day the gentleman now insists he will take back what he said to the Chair and will refuse to allow the committee to rise.

Mr. ROBINSON. May I say a word for myself? At this stage of the proceedings I can state my position better than the gentleman from Texas. I am recognized by the Chair and am entitled to an hour. If the committee and the House have no disposition to take that hour from me—and I will not occupy it; I will not do it merely for the sake of malevolence; if I do not choose to occupy it they shall have it back, or what is left of it—then I am willing the committee shall take any proceedings which will save to me my rights on the floor to occupy one hour when the committee resumes its session. Anything which may be done under that consideration and understanding may be done now.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not understand because the gentleman gets the floor he can control this House under its rules in limiting debate.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have the floor.

Mr. REAGAN. It may be the House will be willing to extend the debate, but I am not sure. I have no objection to letting the gentleman speak. I only object to his statement that by his action he can defeat and control the rules of this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts can occupy his hour.

Mr. REAGAN. Very well. Let him go on and do it.

Mr. PAGE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If the gentleman from Massachusetts should yield to a motion that the committee rise when the House again meets to go into committee, can it limit debate so as to cut off his hour?

The CHAIRMAN. It can.

Mr. ROBESON. I rise for another parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROBESON. If the gentleman retains the floor to-morrow morning when we come together, or the next time this business comes up, can any gentleman rise and move to limit debate while he is on the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The motion to limit debate is never in order in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROBESON. I mean if he reserves his right by consent and yields only for the purpose of moving that the committee rise.

Mr. REAGAN. When he yields to a motion to rise he yields subject to the order of the House to limit debate if it chooses. He may go on and occupy his time now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the gentleman would be controlled by the action of the House.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Chairman, I dislike very much now to be compelled to enter into the debate on this question at this late hour. I beg gentlemen to understand that it is not my own will to begin the discussion now.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I understood the Chair to say that he recognized the right of the gentleman from Texas having control of the bill to make the motion for the committee to rise, for the purpose of limiting debate, and inasmuch as the gentleman from Massachusetts had agreed to yield to the gentleman from Texas for that purpose he would recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts. The gentleman from Massachusetts having yielded for the motion of the gentleman from Texas, I insist the motion of the gentleman from Texas has precedence and the gentleman from Massachusetts is not in order or entitled to the floor, but having yielded for the purpose of limiting debate would be bound like other members by the limitation of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not state that he recognized the gentleman from Massachusetts with the understanding that he was to yield to the gentleman from Texas for that purpose.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Then I was mistaken.

The CHAIRMAN. But that the Chair had recognized the gentleman from Massachusetts and then understood him to say that he would yield to the gentleman from Texas. But it was not a conditional but an absolute recognition.

Mr. ATKINS. All this is taken out of the time of the gentleman, I suppose? If not, it ought to be.

Mr. ROBINSON. I was ready, Mr. Chairman, as I stated at the outset, to consent that the committee should rise, if fair play was to be given and the understanding was had that I was to have the floor when the committee resumed its sitting, but not to yield for a motion that would take me from the floor and debar me of the right and privilege I hold to occupy the floor in my own time.

I address myself to the questions presented by this bill. I have no hostility to river and harbor appropriation bills. I have voted for some of them, and some I have voted against. They are to be considered upon their merits; and I ask the attention of this committee to this question, because in this bill Congress is asked to enter upon a new course of procedure, and I challenge the attention of the House that it shall begin right.

It is not a question as to whether the original sum of eight millions of dollars or thereabout, shall be applied for the improvement of the ordinary rivers and harbors. But I ask you to give in the consideration of the improvement of the Mississippi River attention to the plan adopted by the Mississippi River commission.

If gentlemen will turn to page 15 of the bill before us, they will find a provision which appropriates $1,000,000 for the inauguration of the great work of improving the Mississippi River.

I submit to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce and to his fourteen associates that they should at least accord to the House the privilege of considering the plan that has been submitted or suggested for the improvement of that river. I recollect in the Forty-fifth Congress it was my privilege and duty to serve upon the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River. I paid close attention to the subject, and then united with the committee in presenting a bill which became a law in June, 1879. Under that bill the Mississippi River commission was created, and under that we have the report which has been submitted to the House and known as Executive Document No. 58, second session of the Forty-sixth Congress.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are gentlemen here who remember the debate we had when that bill was passed by this House. They will remember it, not alone as having been participated in by gentlemen remote in the east on the Atlantic shore, but by gentlemen in the Mississippi Valley who had a special interest in this great work. It was then said that Congress was not or would not be called upon to expend any money by that bill, nor would it be called upon for that purpose until the "plan" proposed by that commission should be brought back for consideration by Congress and fully decided upon after debate. Therefore, I submit to this Committee of Commerce that they fail to do justice to this House when they ask us to pass under a suspension of the rules, or by this other sort of snap judgment proposed, upon a measure of that sort which may involve the expenditure of $75,000,000 without a moment's consideration. It is not the way to deal with the money of the American people. It is not the way to deal with the judgment of other gentlemen that have seats upon this floor. I am in favor, and have always been in favor, of the improvement of the Mississippi River for purposes of navigation. I need not repeat that here. Gentlemen who remember the remarks that I made upon the passage of that bill will corroborate what I say, and gentlemen from that locality along the Mississippi River know that I stood by the bill and assisted in its passage. I am willing now to do so, but I want the appropriation guarded so we do not give a wide latitude that we will some time repent.

The great question that underlies this matter as a matter of objection is, that the Congress of the United States shall not commit the United States Treasury to the protection of the lands lying along the banks of that river. There has been inaugurated, as is well known, a levee system, which has been maintained along that river, a system inaugurated for the protection of the alluvial lands and undoubtedly a system of great value. It was maintained by individnals and by States; and Congress, seeing the burdens that would come upon those communities, made grants of land to those States to enable them to bear the expense. They took charge of that, and up to the time of the war supported those levees out of private and individual subscriptions or contributions and out of State treasuries.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to state in this connection, if the gentleman will allow me only a moment, that one member of the commission a few days ago was before a sub-committee of which I was a member, and in relation to the plan said that he did not conceive the matter was under the control of Congress at all; that the act creating the commission left the whole matter subject to them; and that they made their estimates upon their own conception of what ought to be done, without any idea of its being reviewed here. And he supposed that their plans—he could not state the amount accurately—in the course of ten years would cover at least an expenditure of one hundred millions of dollars. He said he could not answer, but at the end of that time the expenditure would reach that amount.

Mr. GIBSON. I would like to know what member of the commission made such a statement, and by what authority he made such a statement on behalf of the commission.

Mr. BLOUNT. I state what occurred; what was said by one member of the commission.

Mr. GIBSON. The official report of the commission is before this House, and has been before the Committee on Commerce as well as the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River, and there is nothing in it to warrant that statement.

Mr. BLOUNT. The report is here.

Mr. GIBSON. There is nothing in that report that will justify the gentleman from Georgia in the statement just made; and if the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit me to answer him in turn, I will say there is nothing to justify the line of remark he has been indulging in.

Mr. BLOUNT. There is ample room for what has been said in the act creating the commission and the report made thus far.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I call upon the gentleman from Georgia to name the commissioner to whom he has referred.

Mr. BLOUNT. Let me have the floor and I will make good what I have just stated.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] has the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON. I believe that I was talking about the Mississippi River when I left off. I was here when that bill was upon its passage in the Forty-sixth Congress. It was not claimed by any one that the commission had any power to expend any money without the direct authority of Congress. And if any gentleman will consult that act, which is chapter 43 of the first session of the Forty-sixth Congress, he will find no expenditure is authorized except by the express appropriation and approval of Congress. Therefore what any member of the commission claims is not of any particular importance at the present time in this discussion. What I say is that we should undertake the work of improving the river for the purposes of navigation. I deny that it was ever in the contemplation of Congress in that act that we should appropriate money to protect the alluvial lands along the bank of that river.

Mr. GIBSON. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. ROBINSON. I deny it was ever in the contemplation of Congress that we should put the money of the United States on the alluvial lands of the delta of the Mississippi and supply that money from the United States Treasury.

Mr. GIBSON. I desire to ask a simple question.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will yield for a question.

Mr. GIBSON. Is there anything in the report of the commission or in the appropriation proposed by the Committee on Commerce which has in view the protection or reclamation of the alluvial lands in the Mississippi bottom?

Mr. ROBINSON. I will give a simple answer to a simple question. If the gentleman had been patient a little longer he would have heard my answer to that.

If this is such a simple matter I say let this great question come in here by a separate bill and let the plan be considered in this House pro and con. Is not that the way to deal with a question that means an appropriation of $50,000,000 or more before it ends? Then, is it the way to put it on the river and harbor bill, and perhaps compel some gentlemen that want the river and harbor appropriations to vote something they do not know anything about, or something they do not quite approve, for the sake of getting some inlet improved? Ah, this looks like a little sharp practice in this matter that would not stand proper consideration! And now I come to the question of the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. CHALMERS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I desire to be allowed just one word.

Mr. ROBINSON. Not now, until I answer the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. GIBSON,] and then if I can answer the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. HUMPHREY,] I will take him up.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Just in connection with this point.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will not take you now. I answer the gentleman from Louisiana who asks me if there is anything in the report or the bill that goes to the protection of the alluvial lands. I ask the gentleman to read the report. I have it here. In the first place I commend to his careful attention the fact that the commission are not unanimous in this report. Two members of that commission, General Comstock, and Hon. Benjamin Harrison of Indiana, do not agree with the majority of the commission in their report. Why? They tell us why. It is because this levee system is included.

Now I will turn to the report of the majority. The commission under that bill was instructed to report on the levee system, and they have done so. The majority of the commission say:

> Levees have never been erected upon the banks of the Mississippi River except for the special purpose of protecting the alluvial lands from overflow. They have, therefore, always had sole reference to the high-water stage, and the degree to which levees might prudently be relied upon "to improve and give safety to navigation," "promote and facilitate commerce, trade, and the postal service," has not hitherto entered into the question of the construction and maintenance of a levee system.

And further on they say:

> While it is not claimed that levees in themselves are necessary as a means of securing ultimately a deep channel for navigation, it is believed that the repair and maintenance of the extensive lines already existing will hasten the work of channel improvement through the increased scour and depth of river bed which they would produce during the high-river stages. They are regarded as a desirable, though not a necessary, adjunct in the general system of improvement submitted.

And then the majority of the commission in their report go on for half a printed page to argue that it would be of great advantage in protecting the roads and the bridges leading to the river, and presenting a means of communication with the river in lieu of wharves and landings, manifestly not for the improvement of the navigation of the river. But it was within the scope of their inquiry, and therefore they have reported upon it. Now, if gentlemen will turn to the views of the minority they will find this:

> We do not concur with the majority of the commission in their estimate of the value of the closure of gaps in existing levees as a factor in the improvement of low-water navigation; this estimate being derived in part from the theoretical views already referred to.

Now, if gentlemen examine this report (and they will have time to do so to-night, and therefore I will not take further time upon it now) they will find a page more of that discussion. I ask that, considering the importance of this question, gentlemen of this committee shall look into that report before they act upon this bill, and if they deem it necessary to move proper amendments to the bill that they shall do so.

So far as levees are of importance to the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River, so far as they are necessary to that improvement—and we all want to accomplish the work, and we are all willing to pay for it out of the country's Treasury—so far as they are essential to the work, then let the levees be protected, and if need be let them be rebuilt. But I suspect what we learned in the other committee of the Forty-fifth Congress, and my friend from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] knows it, that the people of this section are alive in their advocacy of the construction of these levees for the protection of their lands. And why should they not be? I commend their zeal; I commend them for insisting that their Representatives here shall press the matter upon the consideration of Congress. But it is not legitimate for us to carry out their views.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. ROBINSON. For a question, yes.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I desire to say to him that, so far as we are concerned, if the theory and plan of the Mississippi River commission is adopted and carried out, we are perfectly willing that no gap in a levee shall be closed and no levee shall be built. That is the proposition.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not quite understand the gentleman.

Mr. ROBERTSON. If this House shall pass the appropriation recommended by the Committee on Commerce, we are perfectly willing that not one dollar of it shall be applied to building a levee. We want the plan recommended by the Mississippi River commission as a mode of improving the navigation of that river to be carried out, and we will not ask one dollar for a levee.

Mr. ROBINSON. The minority of that commission further say:

> For these reasons we are of the opinion that levees are of very little value in improving the low-water navigation of the river. Of their necessity in protecting alluvial lands against destructive floods there can be no doubt, and to obtain such protection the first step would be the closure of gaps in existing levees.

Now, if my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. HUMPHREY] has a question to ask I will hear him.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I have talked with at least four members of this commission——

Mr. ROBINSON. I thought the gentleman wanted to ask a question, not to testify.

Mr. HUMPHREY. They have said that they do not wish a dollar of this money to be expended except under the direction of the War Department; that it shall be expended as all other moneys appropriated by this bill are expended, under the direction of the War Department.

Mr. ROBINSON. I bring this matter plainly to the attention of gentlemen who are so strongly defending it. If this appropriation was for the improvement of low-water navigation, I would be with them. If they want that only, certainly the English language will enable them to frame a provision that shall give that and only that.

I see by referring to this bill that the appropriation is to be expended by the Secretary of War "upon the plan adopted by the Mississippi River commission." What is that plan? Of course it is the plan of the majority, and not the plan of the minority. By referring to page 19 of the report of the Mississippi River commission, I find the estimates for works of improvement for the first fiscal year. Among those estimates is this: "Closing gaps in levees, $1,010,000." How much more is to come for succeeding fiscal years nobody knows.

Mr. ROBERTSON. That is every dollar; they do not want another dollar.

Mr. ROBINSON. My friend says they do not want another dollar; yet he is wrong, because turning to other pages of this report I find it stated that it will take $2,020,000 to repair the levees.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Will the gentleman allow me just a moment?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Two million dollars is the total estimate for closing all the gaps from the mouth of the Mississippi to the mouth of the Ohio—the whole line of the levees. The total expense of the work which the gentleman from Massachusetts contemplates would cost $50,000,000, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] $100,000,000, will be only $2,000,000 for the completion of the whole line of levees from the mouth of the Mississippi to the mouth of the Ohio.

Mr. ROBINSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, while I do not of course urge my views in opposition to those of the engineers on this commission, yet I submit——

Mr. GIBSON. I will not interrupt the gentleman now, but will merely say that when he has concluded I shall seek the floor to make some remarks in explanation of this question.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Chairman, I presume this committee will wish to continue the discussion after I get through; and my friend [Mr. GIBSON] who is interested in this matter will certainly want to say something. The House will be very glad to hear him, and no one more so than myself. I hope that we shall discuss this question and this great feature presented by the bill, because, gentlemen, you are now taking the first step which is to inaugurate this work in which the people of the Mississippi Valley and of the whole country are interested. I look upon it with no disfavor or prejudice. I approach it simply in a business way, in the interest of the Treasury of the United States. We ought to discuss this question calmly.

I was saying that I would not put my opinion against that of the engineers on the commission. But I see that those gentlemen differ. I know that these levees are on the top of the banks of the river; I know that in low water the levees are high and dry in the sun; and I know that however strong and high the levees may be built they afford no improvement to navigation when the water is low. I know very well that those levees standing on the bank of the river are of no use except when the water rises above the level of the soil; and when it comes to that point you are asked to believe by this commission that the river will set to work scouring out its bed and thus deepen its own channel. That theory in itself appears to me to be reasonable and is borne out by the facts. But I ask gentlemen to bear in mind that this very same commission has said that before undertaking anything of that kind we should put into the law some provision under which the United States may take possession of the land, and may have it properly appraised. I find nothing of that kind in this meager provision in the river and harbor bill. We are left at the mercy of the land-owner. Under this bill the United States will have no jurisdiction at all on the banks of those rivers as against the power and authority of the sovereign States bordering thereon.

The levees are not on the immediate bank of the river; many of them are back at a great distance; and what will you do with the intervening space? Who owns that land? Who owns the land beyond the levee? Shall the United States go on in this way with eyes shut, taking no precaution against a policy that will surely eat in and eat in until the amount involved shall not be $50,000,000, but ten times that?

I want to drive the stake right here and now. I want to put on record the protest of this Congress against beginning a work that shall in any way commit this Government to the repair of the levees and the maintenance of them in future time out of the Treasury of the United States—I mean their repair and protection as a guarantee against the overflow of the lands; and I think this Congress is with me on this point. I do not want gentlemen who are so vitally interested in this matter, and are here urging it upon this floor, so to crowd this measure through this committee and through this House that we shall not have an opportunity to present any ordinary amendment. I think an amendment can be presented which gentlemen who are in favor of this scheme most actively will say does not strip their provision of vitality and force; which, while providing for the improvement of the navigation of the river, will not commit the United States to the reclamation and protection of the overflowed lands. In that form I am in favor of such a provision; but I want proper time for consideration. I do not want this matter put in such a position that when we get back into Committee of the Whole to-morrow or next day no gentleman shall be allowed to offer an amendment to any of the sections of the bill. What attitude are we to be in? Do gentlemen of the Mississippi Valley want to prejudice the whole country against this scheme by driving it rough-shod through this House? That is not the way to inaugurate it.

Mr. GIBSON. Far from it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly; far from it. Nobody would rebel aginst such a proposition more than my fair-minded friend from Louisiana, [Mr. GIBSON.] I was with him in the adoption of the original bill; and I want to stay with him until we have inaugurated this work upon sound principles; and I do not want that either he or I shall be carried off our feet by any inconsiderate action in this House or in this committee.

I have said enough at this late hour of the day to bring this question to the attention of the committee. When the bill comes to be considered by paragraphs I will endeavor to submit an amendment, if I have the opportunity, and I will do it in entire accord with the real and proper purpose of the gentlemen who urge the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River.

Mr. Chairman, there are gentlemen who desire some of my time, and I will be happy to yield first to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. DUNN. I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts to submit his amendment, and let it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. ROBINSON. I supposed in regular order we would first consider it by paragraph, and, not believing it would come up to-day, I am not prepared to present my amendment at this time. I can prepare an amendment hurriedly, but I do not wish to do that.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I hope the gentleman will yield to me for a question.

Mr. ROBESON. How much time has the gentleman from Massachusetts left?

The CHAIRMAN. Thirty minutes. How much time does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. ROBINSON. I will yield for a question to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. ROBERTSON. The gentleman has referred to the minority report of the commission. Was not that minority report solely with reference to the fact that the levees had been an improvement to the navigation of the river, and that the majority of the commission had taken the ground that the closing of the gaps in the levees was an adjunct to the improvement of the high-water navigation? And was not the only difference between the majority and the minority as to the fact that the levees were not an adjunct to the improvement of the Mississippi in high water?

Mr. ROBINSON. Let me answer the gentleman. The object which lies at the bottom of this scheme is in the improvement of low-water navigation of the Mississippi River. When there is plenty of water in the Mississippi River they can float their boats. It may not be so convenient to land, but there is a plenty of water. It is the great bars forming obstructions to navigation which are desired to be removed.

Now I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey for five minutes if he wishes.

Mr. ROBESON. Mr. Chairman, I think I can say all that I desire in five minutes.

I wish to present one other consideration in regard to this question, and I premise it by saying that I am the friend and advocate of internal improvements. I recognize the fact that "the great father of waters" drains the resources of an empire and bears the wealth of a nation to the sea. I would give to it all the help and accord to it all the favor that the generous spirit of a great and wealthy community may pour into its lap, under the Constitution and laws of my country. I would rejoice to see its banks bloom and blossom like the rose; I would love to hear its cities resounding with the hum of trade and vocal with the glad music of honest industry; but I would love far more to see its people really free, prosperous, and happy.

I desire to remind my friends who live on the banks of that mighty river that great empires are not born of mere legislation and that real success does not grow up merely by the expenditure of money. These are born of the enjoyment and exercise of good government. They grow from obedience to wise laws. They develop in the acceptance of that onward and upward impulse which swells in the hearts, and lives in the energies of a free and ambitious population. And I would further remind them of the fact that wherever an insulting and impassable barrier shuts up the career of popular ambition, there all the nobler energies of the character are repressed and extinguished.

I shall perhaps vote for this bill if properly amended and guarded, but I here and now give notice, and I hope members will remember the fact and will ponder on its significance to-night and in future, that it is in accordance with the principles and the history of Anglo-Saxon government to require and enforce the observance of law by withholding supplies. I wish to remind gentlemen that there was a time in the history of Anglo-Saxon government when the "divinity that doth hedge a king" was invoked to make the provisions of law and the will of the people powerless, by the assertion that in the face of kingly prerogative there was no constitutional power in the Parliament of England to restrain the open violations of English law which took place under its notice.

We have now on the banks of the beautiful Mississippi a condition of things existing in open and daily disregard and violation of national law which few men think it worth their while to deny, but which the world understands and of which the people of your country must take notice. And we are met at every turn when we seek to remedy the evil, by the assertion, perhaps the truthful assertion, that there is no constitutional power available for that purpose; that this great wrong is one protected by the rights of the States, and, sanctioned by the silence or ineffective action of State laws, is hedged in by the sanctity which surrounds a sovereign State. But I would suggest to my friends for their future reflection—I trust they will take my suggestion in good part as I give it—in kindly spirit I wish to remind them of this truth of political history and philosophy, (and I hope they will draw from it a moral and a lesson,) that it is in complete accordance with the principles and history of Anglo-Saxon government, and within the scope of constitutional power and political duty, to require as a condition for the granting of national supplies the recognition of the national Constitution and the observance of national law. [Applause.]

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise for the purpose of antagonizing any proposition to appropriate money for the purpose of improving the harbors or improving the navigable streams of this country. I rise simply for the purpose of antagonizing a proposition incorporated in this bill that has neither one of these objects in view. On Monday last when this bill was before the House for consideration I went to my colleague who was a member of the Committee on Commerce and called his attention to the clause beginning at line 350, on page 15 of this bill, and stated to him that I feared the language of that clause would commit this Government not only to the construction but to the maintenance as well of the levee system which has been in vogue and which heretofore has been constructed and maintained by local enterprise and local interests. He has assured me that he had no such conception. He had no idea that the language was subject to that construction; and while the gentleman in charge of this bill, the gentleman from Texas, was upon the floor, I propounded the question to him in good faith for the purpose of ascertaining the fact whether the million of dollars that is provided for in the clause to which I have just called the attention of the committee was designed to be expended in the improvement of the navigation of the river, or whether it was to be expended for filling up the broken gaps of the levees on the southern Mississippi from Cairo to New Orleans. And the gentleman undertook to respond to me by saying distinctly that he would answer my question. But instead of answering the question he went on to tell the House that they proposed to improve the Mississippi River by reaches; and he then went on and gave the estimates that had been made by the Mississippi River commission as to what it would cost to improve certain reaches upon the river—failing to answer the question whether the money was to be used for purposes of building up the levees or for the purpose of improving the navigation of the river, as I had asked him.

I will permit no man, Mr. Chairman, in this House or elsewhere, no man in this country, to go further than I will go in making proper appropriations for the improvement of the harbors of the country and the navigable streams thereof; and above all am I anxious, and always shall be, to see reasonable sums of money appropriated for the improvement of the navigation of that great stream, the Mississippi River. Upon its banks I was born, and upon its banks I have lived all my life, and it has been the dream of my childhood and the hope of my manhood some day to see that great river, that magnificent public highway of the Mississippi Valley for the delivery of its products—I say that I have hoped to see it become the great highway that for years in the past we have been anticipating and striving for. But, Mr. Chairman, I am irrevocably opposed under the guise of an improvement of that navigation to taking public moneys out of the Treasury to reclaim the lands belonging to private individuals. And when I investigated this question further for the purpose of getting at the true facts of the case in connection with the answer of my colleague, and also with the answer received from the gentleman from Texas, I went to work and examined carefully the "plan" that is referred to in this bill. Permit me to read the clause to which I have referred:

For the improvement of the Mississippi River in accordance with the plan therefor adopted by the Mississippi River commission, to be expended by the Secretary of War with the advice and under the supervision of said commission, the sum of $1,000,000.

In that investigation, Mr. Chairman, I went to the report of that military commission to ascertain what the plan was that this bill proposes to appropriate $1,000,000 to accomplish, and I find in that plan that they recommend the adoption of what is known as the "levee system;" and they state further that it will take $2,020,000 to repair the broken links in that levee as it now exists. Not only that, but it commits them, as they say distinctly in their report, not only to the filling up of the existing gaps in that system, but commits them as well to the increasing of the height of the levees in order that they may retain within their banks the increased volume of water that under their system will be compelled to flow between them, thereby committing this Government not only to the repair of those levees upon the level as they now exist, but to the increase of their height, as experience in the past shall demonstrate may be necessary, at a cost that the commission do not even dare to submit figures to this House in support of. I say, Mr. Chairman, it commits this Government not only to the repair and construction and reconstruction of these levees, but it commits them for all time to keep and maintain them in order.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ROBINSON. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Ten minutes.

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield one-half of that time to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] and the other half to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. CHALMERS.]

Mr. HAWLEY. My recollections and experiences are somewhat similar to those of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ROBINSON,] but more limited. I remember very well that I advocated the appointment of the commission for the examination of the Mississippi River, and that I answered some objections to it, the chief objection being that we were embarking in a vast and expensive scheme, by saying that, as everybody knew, something, and something important must be done there, and an indispensable preliminary was to obtain a mass of information from scientific men, that we might have the knowledge upon which to base deliberate action and mature plans that would take a long time and large sums of money to carry out.

I voted for the commission in the hope that we should get such information, and supposing that when we got it we should sit down deliberately and perhaps establish a commission, give it powers and lay out a great work. Now we have received—what? This little pamphlet, [holding up the report of the commission.] That is all the report this commission has ever made, or, at least, that has been printed for us. It contains only twenty-two pages, part of which is formal. It is styled a "preliminary or partial report," and a part of the twenty-two pages is occupied by a report of the protesting minority. I supposed I should get from the commission information—of this description for example: that we should have a distinct line drawn between two classes of improvements, improvements with two distinct motives. One class of improvements would aim at the protection of lands for the general benefit of agriculture. The other motive for works would be the improvement of the channel of the river, solely for the benefit of commerce.

Now, obviously the rights and the duties of Congress with regard to those two entirely different purposes are as distinct as the purposes themselves. Have we a right to enter upon a gigantic system of land improvement? That is a great question. If we have, we must give to a well-organized commission power to condemn and appropriate lands, to assess and collect benefits, and to pay damages. But if, on the other hand, it is our sole duty and intention to improve the navigation of the river, that is a very different and more simple affair, requiring a different commission and much less labor; because we are accustomed to enterprises of that kind.

I find in this little brief, imperfect, and practically useless report no lines whatever drawn between these two classes of works. They are perhaps not purposely but actually so mingled, so confusedly referred to, that one has difficulty in perceiving what are the purposes of the commission. The protesting minority declare:

Levees are of very little value in improving the low-water navigation of the river. Of their necessity in protecting alluvial lands against destructive floods, there can be no doubt.

And the majority ask for four or five million dollars, largely for the general purposes of levees. That is an evasion of the duties imposed on the commission. To name four million dollars for a work that we are constantly told may ultimately cost fifty or a hundred is but trifling with the country. I am willing to embark on a well-considered plan that would take a good deal more than the sum asked for by the commission. But I am not willing to vote even $100,000 with this meager scrap of information before me. I desire this whole subject to be laid before us, not by engineers alone but by lawyers also, that we may act deliberately.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] is entitled to five minutes.

Mr. CHALMERS. The report of the Mississippi River commission shows distinctly that the Mississippi River bears more sediment at the time of high water than at any other. It shows too it is at that time more silt is deposited if the stream is in any way interfered with. It is then the sand-bars are mostly formed. Therefore the commission came to the conclusion that in order to prevent the deposit of silt and to prevent the forming of sand-bars, the levees are necessary to keep the water continually flowing on to the Gulf. If the levees break or if any obstruction occurs in the course of the current, the sand-bars begin immediately to form. Hence it is the levees are said to be an adjunct to the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River. The commission says that the levees keep the water at high-tide rolling with uniformity and bearing its silt to the Gulf; that they prevent the formation of sand-bars, which obstruct low-water navigation, and at the same time furnish incidental protection to the alluvial lands of the Mississippi Valley.

Now, many of the gentlemen who have spoken here I think are very willing to vote direct protection to iron interests, direct protection to manufacturing and ship-building interests, and yet when, for the first time, the agriculturists, the cotton and sugar planters, are about to obtain, possibly, some little incidental protection from this great Government, gentlemen say no; no protection to the farmer, no protection to the great agricultural interest, no protection to that great valley which produces more sugar and cotton per acre than any other portion of this country, and can produce still more to help pay the debts of this Government if the levees are kept up. But gentlemen from Massachusetts, [Mr. ROBINSON,] from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] and from Illinois [Mr. MARSH] say they are not willing to give us even incidental protection; they are willing to do nothing which will seem even to commit this Government to keep up the levees. I thank the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] for the more kindly and statesmanlike remarks that were made by him. He spoke as an American citizen. He spoke as if the people who live behind those levees were American citizens. He did not speak of us as if we were aliens, as if we had no part and parcel in this great American Union.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the gentleman——

Mr. CHALMERS. He recognized us as part of this great nation, and that our interests were entitled to as much protection as the manufacturing interests of Massachusetts or the iron interests of Pennsylvania.

Mr. ROBINSON. I had the pleasure of yielding to the gentleman from Mississippi while I had the floor.

Mr. CHALMERS. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not understand that the gentleman means to imply that I said anything about his being an alien, or about anybody along the river being an alien.

Mr. CHALMERS. When gentlemen talk about refusing us protection, and especially when the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON,] whom I do not now see in his seat, lectured us as if we were heathens and Hottentots, as if we did not understand the Constitution of the country, and as if we were not in favor of observing the laws, I think they seem disposed to treat us as aliens. I desire to say that we are the most law-abiding, law-loving, and peaceful citizens of this country. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. I think my friend from Mississippi, when he speaks of aliens, means only carpet-baggers; that is all.

Mr. CHALMERS. I am willing to take your carpet-baggers if they do not come down there to steal what little we have. I have in my district a man from the gentleman's own State, a carpet-bagger, if you choose, who has been an office-holder, and who is to-day a cotton-planter. He lives behind one of these levees, and we are perfectly willing that he shall be protected along with the rest of us. [Great laughter.]

A MEMBER. That certainly is magnanimous.

Mr. CHALMERS. And if the gentleman from Maine himself will come down there, we will ask that he be protected; that the waters shall not flow over him, and that the craw-fish shall not feed upon him. [Laughter.]

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. But you will duck him in the river.

Mr. CHALMERS. No, we do not propose to duck him in the river. I have not time to go fully into this question. On a former occasion I showed that so far as the constitutional power is concerned, there is certainly as much power under the Constitution in Congress to build these levees as there was to dig canals, to build railroads across the continent, or to build turn-pikes, as was done in former times. There is certainly as much power to protect the agricultural interests of Louisiana, Mississippi, Arkansas, Missouri, Kentucky, and Tennessee as there is to protect any other interest which this Government has given protection to in the past.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ACKLEN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. REAGAN. I move that the committee now rise.

Mr. ACKLEN. I only desired to yield to the gentleman from Texas. [Laughter.]

Mr. GIBSON. I would very much like a few minutes—[cries of "Question!" "Question!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the motion that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CARLISLE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CAMP. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to ask if it will be the pleasure of the House now to indicate a time when general debate in Committee of the Whole on the river and harbor bill shall cease?

Many MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. REAGAN. Let me make a statement. The ruling of the chairman of the Committee of the Whole makes it necessary to take up that bill by paragraphs for consideration and amendment.

Mr. CAMP. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion that the House now adjourn.

MINING RESOURCES—ALABAMA.

Pending the motion to adjourn,

Mr. CONVERSE, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on the Public Lands, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 5991) to exclude the State of Alabama from the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States," approved May 10, 1872; which was placed on the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

The motion of Mr. CAMP was then agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Rules, reported adversely on the following resolution submitted by Mr. INGALLS and referred to that committee on the 14th of January:

Resolved, That the forty-third standing rule of the Senate be amended by striking out in line 13 the words "relating to adjournment" and inserting the words "to adjourn."

Mr. INGALLS. What is the report?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Adverse.

Mr. INGALLS. It seems to me that must have been done without a consideration of the real purpose of the proposed amendment of the rule. Under the rule as it now stands not only a motion to adjourn is not debatable but a motion that when the Senate adjourn it adjourn to a certain day is not debatable. On several occasions heretofore that matter has resulted in great inconvenience to the Senate. The amendment was offered by me upon consultation with several members of the Senate who thought that the rule required amendment in that particular.

Under all parliamentary law that I am acquainted with the only motion relating to adjournment which is not debatable is a simple motion to adjourn; but in the nature of things a motion to adjourn to a given day, or that when the Senate adjourn it be to a certain day, ought to be debatable.

I wish that the chairman of the Committee on Rules, if the committee have not acted with great deliberation on the subject, would consent that the report be withdrawn, because on several occasions serious inconvenience has arisen by reason of the rule as it now stands.

Mr. MORGAN. The forty-third rule reads as follows:

When a question is pending no motion shall be received but—
To adjourn,
To adjourn to a day certain, or that, when the Senate adjourn, it shall be to a day certain,
To take a recess,
To proceed to the consideration of executive business,
To lay on the table,
To postpone indefinitely,
To postpone to a day certain,
To commit,
To amend;
which several motions shall have precedence in the order in which they stand arranged; and the motions relating to adjournment, to take a recess, to proceed to executive business, and to lay on the table, shall be decided without debate.

The Senate has been acting under that rule for a long time, and it has not been found to be an inconvenient rule, because whenever a motion is made to take a recess or to adjourn to a day certain unanimous consent has not been withheld for such interchange of ideas as Senators might think fitting to the occasion. It is better, as the committee understand, to leave the rule as it is, so that the consideration of a pending question cannot be impeded by a motion, for instance, to adjourn to a day certain, or that when the Senate adjourn it shall be to a day certain. Under the existing rules a Senator has the right to propose a motion of that kind in opposition to the pending question, and if upon a motion of that kind debate should be allowed to spring up and to be extended at the will and pleasure of the Senate, we should find ourselves in the midst of the consideration of some important question, I dare say involved in a debate as to adjournment to a day certain or to take a recess.

The committee have thought it was much more safe and quite as convenient that the rule should stand as it is rather than break down the usage under which the Senate has so long worked and worked so well, for the mere purpose of having debate on a question as to taking a recess or an adjournment to a day certain.

Mr. INGALLS. The rule as it now stands is an innovation. This is not the established rule of the Senate. It was adopted inadvertently when the last revision of the rules was made. I do not want to protract debate on an immaterial question, and I ask that the report may go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BECK asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2175) to appropriate money for the renovation of the records of the United States district court at Frankfort, Kentucky; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CONKLING (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2176) granting a pension to Mrs. Clara A. Thompson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WALLACE asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 157) for the relief of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION OF 1883.

Mr. KERNAN asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 156) in relation to the international exhibition of 1883; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. KERNAN. I ask that the joint resolution be read at length with a view to asking that it be passed now, if there be no objection.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, &c., That whenever the President shall deem the preparations which shall have been made therefor adequate, he is hereby authorized and requested, in the name of the United States, to invite all foreign governments to be represented at and to take part in the international exhibition of arts, manufactures, and products of the soil and mine, to be held under the direction of the United States international commission, at the city of New York, in the State of New York, in the year 1883: Provided, however, That the United States shall not be liable, directly or indirectly, for any of the expenses attending such exhibition, or by reason of the invitation hereby authorized.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that the joint resolution ought to be printed and go to a committee.

Mr. KERNAN. I did not hear what the Senator from Vermont said; but I can suppose that, without explanation, he said the joint resolution should be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I will say to him that I went to the chairman of that committee with the resolution and he read it and said he thought there was no need of such a reference, inasmuch as the invitations should be issued before another session, and it is desirable that the joint resolution should be acted upon now. It will be observed that it is very guarded; it is in the form of one adopted before, and provides expressly that there shall be no expense entailed by implication or otherwise. I should be glad to have the joint resolution passed now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The invitation to a foreign government by the chief of this one to attend any of the numerous and pleasant festivities that we have in this country, with a clause at the end of the invitation "At your own expense," would be somewhat different from the invitations that among gentlemen here we receive and act upon to go and dine, and so on. Therefore, I should a little prefer that the Committee on Foreign Relations would think what sort of an invitation it would be if the foreign government were told that they must come at their own expense. A reference will not delay it much, and I should be glad to have that committee consider it.

Mr. KERNAN. I only want to say that this is the form of invitation adopted in reference to the former international exposition at Philadelphia, and it only invites the people of foreign governments to exhibit their articles; but if the Senator objects of course it must go to the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Shall the joint resolution be referred?

Mr. KERNAN. Not unless the Senator from Vermont objects to its present consideration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it had better be referred. The committee can report it without delay after examination.

Mr. KERNAN. I shall make no objection to the reference.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CONKLING subsequently said: I ask that the reference of the joint resolution in relation to the world's fair be changed from the Committee on Foreign Relations to the Committee on Finance. The Committee on Finance had charge of the bill in which the exposition was conceived, and I do not think that the joint resolution had better go to another committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and that change of reference will be made.

INAUGURATION COMMITTEE.

Mr. PENDLETON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee of three Senators be appointed by the President of the Senate to make the necessary arrangements for the inauguration of the President-elect of the United States on the 4th day of March next.

Messrs. PENDLETON, ANTHONY, and BAYARD were appointed.

REFUNDING OF NATIONAL DEBT.

Mr. BAYARD. I desire to give notice to the Senate that on Monday next, at the expiration of the morning hour, I shall ask it to take up, consider, and finally dispose of the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt. I do not now ask that a special order may be made of this measure to be considered on that day, because upon consultation with gentlemen in the Chamber I find that a special order may itself be set aside by a majority vote. Therefore, as the same control will affect the question whether the bill be made a special order or not, and the matter will be within the control of a majority of the Senate on Monday, and as I think a measure of this importance should be discussed in unbroken debate, I do not desire to call it up to-morrow, being Saturday, to have the interval of Sunday, but on Monday I shall ask at the time indicated that the Senate may proceed to discuss and dispose of this important measure.

Mr. MORRILL. I cannot doubt that the Senate generally will concur in the suggestion of the Senator from Delaware. There is no more important bill before the Senate, and unless it shall become a law I fear very much that we shall have an extra session.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. PADDOCK submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUTLER, Mr. JONAS, Mr. JOHNSTON, and Mr. SAULSBURY

submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WHYTE and Mr. SLATER submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 7036) to establish post-routes; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BAYARD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

ARMED TROOPS AT SEAT OF GOVERNMENT.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I beg leave to ask the Senate to allow me now to move——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will first inquire if there be further morning business; and on the conclusion of the morning business will recognize the Senator from New Jersey. Resolutions are now in order.

Mr. HOAR. I submit a resolution, and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to consider and report whether the assembling at the seat of Government of large bodies of organized and armed troops not under the command of the officers of the United States, or under national authority, be not likely to prove in future dangerous in practice, and whether any legislation or declaration of opinion on the subject by Congress be desirable.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the resolution is a mere direction to the Judiciary Committee to consider this question. It does not bind the Senate to any action or opinion upon the subject. I desire, however, to be permitted to say, I suppose there is no citizen of the United States who will take more pleasure and will join more heartily in the expressions of public gratification at the approaching inauguration of the President of the United States than I shall. I think that the organizations of veteran soldiers honorably discharged from the military service of the United States ought properly and appropriately to form a part in the State pageant of that day. I trust everywhere where the American people can do honor to that class of citizens, they will as they grow older receive every possible form of public honor from the country which they have saved. But it seems to me that the persons having this matter in charge will themselves see that the establishment of the precedent of assembling large bodies of armed troops, subject to no authority present in the District, might in the past have been fraught with very serious danger, and may in the future create very serious danger, in addition to those dangers which from the nature of the case may hereafter, in troubled times, attend the transfer of executive power in a country like this from one hand to another.

In 1876 the electoral count was completed at about four o'clock in the morning of the 3d day of March, and until that hour large numbers of the American people believed that the presidential candidate who was not finally found entitled to the office had been duly elected. Suppose a practice had existed in this country under which in anticipation of the inauguration of the President the militia of the different States of the Union had assembled in large numbers and were encamped about the Capitol, who can doubt that such a condition of things would have added seriously to the difficulty and danger of that trying hour? Suppose in 1861 we had succeeded to an established practice of that kind, such a thing would, in my judgment, have proved nearly fatal to the preservation of the Republic itself.

It is therefore in no spirit of unkindness to anybody charged with these preparations, and certainly in no want of a spirit of harmony with the rejoicing and pleasure of the time when the American people are peacefully and quietly to submit to the succession of the executive power, that I call public attention to this matter.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. I forgot to say what I intended when I rose: that in some of the States of the Union such parades of bodies of men not under the control of the State executive are prohibited by law.

Mr. CONKLING. I shall ask that the resolution lie over under the rules; but before doing so I feel moved to make a remark.

I am disposed to think that the American people are chronically and habitually too much in a hurry. There is so much of activity and thrift in our countrymen that holidays and pageants and relaxations and rests are the rare exceptions of the general rule. All other peoples as far as I know, particularly those enjoying the older and more advanced civilizations, have something more than we of what a quaint British poet has called recess, interval. Therefore, I do not deplore the multiplication of holidays; and when I have seen indignation manifested sometimes at the suggestion that an additional day be made a holiday I have reflected in the train of my present suggestion.

The inauguration of a President has come to be one of the few accepted occasions, one of the very few accepted national occasions, when an occurrence takes place furnishing an inducement, an excuse, a provocation for men to break out of the unending round of local and individual endeavor and go away for a change of scene, an episode, or a jaunt.

In the little city in which I live is a military organization. It is known as the Utica Citizens' Corps. It is composed of men of patriotism, of character, of standing; men as well able to govern themselves, to regulate and conduct their conduct,—I mean to say it with great deference,—as the most distinguished or the most experienced Senator I see before me. That organization means to come five hundred miles to participate in this pageant. I hope it will. I should like to have the Senators here who are skilled in military affairs see them march; see how they disport themselves in the manual of the soldier, willing the whole country should look upon their uniforms and upon the personnel of the company.

I am aware that the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts does not seek to disparage or affront any such inclination as I have referred to. I have no thought that the Senator in drawing the resolution or offering it meant any such thing. At the same time, it is a challenge, a reflection. It raises a doubt applicable to just this time now when all preparations have been made as to the coming inauguration, and raises a doubt applicable to all alike, whether there is not some impropriety, some disregard of what it would have been thoughtful and proper to remember, some want of consideration of some thing in the fact that these various military organizations have arranged to meet here on that day and to vie, if they please, with each other in marching and in the manifestation of that military polish and attainment which makes up the emulation between military organizations. I do not wish to see such a charge or such a criticism or such an expression of a possible doubt on the part of the Senate. A long time ago, before these arrangements had been made, circumstances would have been somewhat different; but now, within two or three weeks of the event, after I have personal knowledge in a good many instances that all the arrangements have been concluded, I think it would be a little harsh. Particularly at a time when there is no manifestation anywhere of a sentiment of discord or a disposition to make trouble which need put anybody on his guard, I think it would be inopportune, if I may say it without any possible intention of offense—I think it would be maladroit just now to have this inquiry. Four years will intervene before such another occasion occurs, and during that time I think there will be leisure to ascertain seasonably, so as to give notice to everybody in advance, whether there is any objection in this Republic governed by majorities and operating by general, I wish I could say universal, suffrage to the citizens of the Republic, although they appear in uniform, coming here in one great convention, if they please, to see the Government the robes and scepter pass from the hands of one man into the hands of another. I ask that this resolution lie over under the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The resolution will lie over.

Mr. HOAR. Before the resolution passes over I should like to be privileged to add a word. I selected this occasion not with the expectation that the introduction of this suggestion would affect seriously the preparations for the coming inauguration, but it was because I was myself known to be so cordially in accord with its spirit, because I so thoroughly rejoice in the occasion which is about to take place, and because I was a political friend of the President who is about to be inaugurated, that I thought it was proper for me to make a suggestion which might be supposed to come with ill grace from gentlemen entertaining different political opinions, or who might be suspected of having different sympathies. The time seemed to me to be appropriate because of the very fact that by no possibility could there be a suggestion or a suspicion in any mind that the presence of these soldiers would be an impropriety here or accompanied with any public danger or inconvenience here on the present occasion. That seemed to be the very time when the suggestion that under different conditions of public sentiment at some other period in our history the establishment of such a practice in a time of peace and harmony and quiet in an era of good feeling might ripen into a possible public danger.

It is utterly unimportant whether this resolution lies over or whether it goes to the Committee on the Judiciary this morning. I had no expectation it would be heard of again if it went there; but it seemed to me entirely proper to make this suggestion at the time this thing was going on, so that in advance of the preparations for any future presidential inauguration the fact that this question had been now raised, though it were passed over without decision, would bring the important question to the consideration of the persons in charge.

Mr. HEREFORD. Before this resolution passes from the body, I cannot let the opportunity pass without challenging the correctness of the sentiments embodied in the resolution. I believe that this is a free country, and I believe that the various military organizations of the States under State authority for peaceful purposes have a right to go where they please. The military organizations of the various States have a right to go into any part of their State where they please for peaceful purposes; they have a right to go from State to State for like purposes without let or hinderance; but this resolution introduced this morning by the Senator from Massachusetts suggests the idea that it is highly improper for such organizations to come to the seat of Government and participate in the inauguration of the President of the United States; and that is coupled with the other idea that it is highly proper that the regular Army may be here on such an occasion.

If the sentiments contained in this resolution had been reversed perhaps it would have met more cordially with my approbation than as it stands; that is to say if the resolution declared that on such a day as that of the inauguration of a President the regular Army should be forbidden to be here, I should certainly have subscribed to the correctness of it; but to insert in a resolution here that it is highly proper that troops under national authority, under the control of the General Government, should be here on such a great holiday and that the various military companies of the States have not that right, is an invasion of the liberty of the whole people, and is the announcement of a doctrine that endangers the liberty of this people. I have always been taught to believe that the liberties of the people are best preserved by the various State organizations and not by the regular Army.

I would commend to the Senator from Massachusetts a letter perhaps which he read a few months ago, a letter from General Winfield Scott Hancock when he said that he liked the simplicity of the inauguration of Thomas Jefferson and would commend that to the people of the United States. I commend that letter to him to-day. It meets with my hearty approval. The idea is that when the President of the United States is to be inaugurated he shall be unattended by the Army of the United States, but that the occasion shall be accompanied with all the simplicity that surrounded the inauguration of the administration of that great man.

I could not allow this resolution to pass from the Senate Chamber without challenging the correctness of the doctrines therein laid down, especially that the regular Army shall be here on such an occasion and the militia of the States forbidden to come here. Congress has no such power, and I regret to see the Senator from Massachusetts in this resolution invoke such a power as that, and I hope the resolution will not meet with the favorable consideration of the Senate.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This debate goes on by general consent, the resolution having been objected to.

Mr. CONKLING and others. Regular order!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution lies over.

Mr. INGALLS. I rise to morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask for the consideration of the resolution offered by me yesterday relative to the hour of meeting of the Senate after Monday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas calls up a resolution offered by him.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to have the order read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That on and after Monday next the daily hour of meeting shall be eleven o'clock a. m.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The Vice-President had recognized me as entitled to the floor, and I gave way for morning business. Do I lose my right to the floor thereby?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey has the floor.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I will give way for a moment to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am very much obliged to the Senator from New Jersey. It is my best means of getting heard. I merely wish to say inasmuch as the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has gone over and the regular order was called up after some debate, that I wish to be counted at this present moment as in favor of considering the topic referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts, and to add that I believe what the Senator observed is in the main right, and to add also in response to my friend from West Virginia that the particular letter of the late democratic candidate for President of the United States, to which he refers, and that part of it which he has quoted, meets with my cordial approval, whatever I may think about other letters on other topics. That is all.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 4610) granting a pension to Mary Leggett;

A bill (H. R. No. 3520) to establish a port of delivery at Indianapolis, in the State of Indiana; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5677) granting a pension to Stephen P. Benton.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 201) for the relief of Somerville Nicholson;

A bill (S. No. 1193) granting a pension to Milton L. Sparr; and

A bill (S. No. 1191) for the relief of James Monroe Heiskell, of Baltimore City, Maryland.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 372) authorizing the Public Printer to print reports of the United States Fish Commissioner upon new discoveries in regard to fish-culture.

REVOLUTIONARY BATTLE-FIELDS.

Several SENATORS. Regular order.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I ask that the bill (S. No. 2126) relative to Revolutionary battle-fields be taken up.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask for action on the resolution I offered yesterday that has been called up, and that I have a right to call up under the rules of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. INGALLS. The morning hour, I think, has not expired, with all due respect to the Chair, and if action on the resolution is to be deferred by procrastination merely, by the occupation of the time until the morning hour does expire, of course I must yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not responsible for the clock.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I press my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the bill he has named.

Mr. INGALLS. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I move to lay aside all pending orders and take it up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey moves to postpone the regular order with a view of proceeding with the consideration of the bill proposed by him.

Mr. INGALLS. That motion is not in order, Mr. President.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Why not?

Mr. INGALLS. The only motion in order is to postpone the pending question, not to consider another bill.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I make that motion.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the pending order to be postponed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending order is the Calendar.

Mr. CONKLING. Is not the Post-Office appropriation bill the unfinished business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not until half past one o'clock.

Mr. RANDOLPH. This is a bill that is general in its character, that will elicit no debate, I presume. It comes from the Military Committee, and it has been delayed many weeks. I think it will meet with universal acceptance and approval. I ask, therefore, that it be taken up.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the bill?

Mr. RANDOLPH. It is the bill relative to Revolutionary battle-fields.

Mr. FERRY. Why does not the Senator move to postpone the present and all prior orders and take it up.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I have done that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey moves to postpone the pending order.

The motion to postpone was agreed to, ayes 40, noes not counted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey now moves to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 2126) relative to Revolutionary battle-fields, and so forth, which will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Without discussing the merits of the bill, as the rule says I shall not, there is a question which I believe I have a right to ask. I listened to the reading of the bill and only this instant received a copy. I wish to inquire whether the design and effect of the bill will be to arrest the passage of special bills, if I may call them special, which have already received the action of the House, which have received the action of the committees of the Senate and been favorably reported and are now on the Calendar—bills which in particular instances contain provisions of their own adapted to what has been done in those instances? Under this general bill, as I catch it from the reading, those engaged in such matters may be compelled to begin again, to go over to some extent, and thus to delay works which are in progress. If such be the effect of the bill I should be glad to know it before it is taken up.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, the effect of this bill will be to place all applicants for Government aid in the erection of memorial monuments upon a common footing. That, of course, the Senator from New York can gather from the text of the bill. That it is intended to arrest, to use the Senator's own word, the passage of any other bill is not so; nor will that necessarily be the effect of it. The bill to which the Senator specially refers, I imagine, is the bill concerning the Saratoga monument.

Mr. CONKLING. That is one.

Mr. RANDOLPH. That bill, I may be permitted to say, has passed the House, is before the Senate, and has passed a committee of the Senate. I ought to say in parenthesis, not the committee to which these bills are ordinarily referred, but it has been passed upon favorably by a committee of the Senate, and is now before the Senate. The passage of this general bill does not by any means imply that the Saratoga bill may not be taken up and passed by itself. There is nothing in the terms of the general bill that need delay action upon the part of the Senate in regard to the Saratoga bill.

The Committee on Military Affairs have had a great many bills asking aid in behalf of the construction of Revolutionary monuments before it. After much consideration during the past session and also at the present session, it was concluded by a majority of the committee, only one or two members objecting, that the more equitable and economical way was to provide a general bill, a bill under which any association having in view the commemoration of a Revolutionary battle-field would be authorized, under well-guarded provisions, to apply directly for a sum of money from the Treasury equal to the amount which such patriotic association had itself raised and paid in.

It will be observed that under the terms of the pending bill the Saratoga Association will be as liberally provided for as under the special bill for which they have obtained the favorable action of the Committee on the Library of this body. My own opinion is that in justice to these many patriotic associations with reference to economy by the Government, a bill of this general character placing all applicants for Government aid in erecting Revolutionary battle-field monuments upon an equal footing should be passed now and become a law, thus fixing as far as possible the policy of the Government regarding this class of appropriations.

There are one or two provisions of this bill that I may as well refer to, now that I have the floor, limited as my time is under the rule of the morning hour, one of them looking to the benefit of the Washington Association of New Jersey, located at Morristown, New Jersey. That corporation owns the old Washington headquarters. That building was occupied for a longer time during the revolutionary war by Washington and his staff than any other building in America. During the long and anxious winters of 1779–'80 they spent their days and weeks and months under the broad shelter of that roof, and not only Washington and his staff, but Lafayette, Schuyler, Greene, Hamilton, Kosciusko, De Kalb, Wayne, Light-Horse Harry Lee, Putnam, Steuben, Knox, and even Benedict Arnold lived there for longer or shorter periods. More men known to revolutionary history lived under that roof during the revolutionary war than under any other roof in America.

There during the anxious months of those eventful winters was gathered from time to time almost every prominent member of the Continental Congress. The rooms they counseled in, the furniture they used have been kept in almost perfect preservation by the patriotism of Jerseymen.

It is a grand old house, freighted with grand associations, and worthy of the highest consideration by Congress. I regret that my time——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will remind the Senator from New Jersey that it is not in order to discuss the merits of a bill on a motion to take it up.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I am aware of the indulgence of the Senate, and ask pardon for infringing the rule. I thought the present opportunity was the best one for stating why the fifth section, relating to the Washington Association of New Jersey, had been placed in the bill. I am anxious for the prompt and favorable action of the Senate, and will only repeat that, in the judgment of a majority of the Military Committee, this is the most equitable, just, and, to Government, economical measure that will probably be placed before Congress relating to the subject under discussion.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, did the rules permit the merits of this bill to be discussed on this motion, I should have no word to say against its object. I asked the Senator from New Jersey whether its effect would be to arrest other bills pending in the Senate, and he answers that there is nothing in this bill which would deprive the Senate of the power to take up and act upon other bills. That of course must be true of the bill, whatever its provisions may be. The point of my question was somewhat different, and without touching upon the rules I may say that I find now in this bill provisions which in the instance referred to would require a different proceeding from that already taken. Plans having been adopted, the work having been entered upon, it would be necessary afresh to submit and get approval of the plans and projet of the intended monument. It was to that point that I asked the attention of the Senator from New Jersey.

At Saratoga a memorable and a decisive battle was fought and well fought, and the people of New York have contributed already a sum of money, and they ask the Government to join them in erecting a monument to perpetuate the memory of that struggle. I cannot under the rule give my reasons now; but I think after we pass this bill it could be fairly argued that a bill in that instance special should not be adopted because of the general provisions contained in this. If that should be persuasively the effect upon the Senate, I should regret the adoption of this bill.

I observe that this bill relates to battle-fields. I wonder if there be a member of the Senate who is able to mark the boundaries of battle-fields or locate them. Until I shall hear some Senator volunteer to act as geographer in that respect, I shall believe that no Senator, with or without this bill, will be able to locate and define on the map of this hemisphere its battle-fields; and I am fortified in this by the circumstance to which the honorable Senator has referred that a separate section of the bill is devoted to denoting one place, I think I may say of that conspicuously not a battle-field, which it is intended to have the bill cover. It refers to the headquarters of an army—historic headquarters. The honorable Senator from New Jersey has peopled those headquarters with denizens no more numerous and illustrious than they were, but still it was the headquarters of an army; it was not a field on which men grappled for the mastery in war, and yet it appears by special nomination in this bill because it was seen that "battle-field" would not cover an instance so conspicuously meritorious as that.

When this bill comes up for consideration, if it does, I shall venture to suggest that something is needed to designate one place from another, as many places are not designated by the simple term "battle-field." Indeed I do not know how that word would affect even instances that I have in mind which might be supposed especially to fall within it. Interested as I am in the instance of the monument at Saratoga, and interested as I am in the erection of a monument to Nicholas Herkimer, a name in which for special reasons I feel a special pride, an instance in which $500 was appropriated by the Continental Congress, which $500 and no part of it has ever yet been received, I shall hope that those bills at least may have a fair hearing, having been matured without a knowledge of any measure of this sort, before they are in any respect concluded by the adoption of any generality of provision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey to proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Before the vote is taken I shall be glad to say a word, not on the merits of this bill, but for the purpose of indicating a bill which I think ought to have preference. I am sorry that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSTON] is not present. I gave notice yesterday that I should press on the attention of the Senate a bill that I deem of very great importance, the bill to prevent the spread of contagious diseases among cattle; and if the motion to take up this bill should fail, I will move that that bill be taken up, so that it may have its place during the morning hour and be under consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 2126) relative to Revolutionary battle-fields, &c.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I am of the minority of the Committee on Military Affairs opposing the passage of this bill. Is this bill necessary and proper? If it be it is a direct reflection upon the intelligence and patriotism of the illustrious men who have filled the Halls of Congress from 1800 to this time. There have been periods in our history when this country did not owe one solitary dollar of indebtedness, when we had $28,000,000 of surplus money, and when illustrious statesmen and patriots filled the Halls of Congress, and it never occurred to them to spend that money in the erection of monuments upon the battle-fields of the Revolution. I do not think it is necessary, and I would regret supporting the bill and thereby casting an imputation upon the intelligence and patriotism of the great men who have preceded us.

But I think it ought not to pass for another reason, and that is that it would be a reflection upon the living. It is a direct reflection upon the American people to-day. This bill says to them, "You are so unfeeling, you are so unpatriotic, you are so void of intelligence that you will not cherish the memory of the battle-fields of the Revolution, the struggles of our Revolutionary soldiers, unless Congress taxes you to build senseless, feelingless monuments of marble or statues of bronze, to remind you of those thrilling scenes and events." I should dislike by my vote to cast an imputation, a reflection upon the living, and I am therefore, upon either one of these grounds, opposed to the passage of this bill.

But, Mr. President, what is the necessity for this bill? Look back at our history; see year by year passing by until 1880 and 1881, when this Congress is to distinguish itself as the pre-eminently patriotic and loyal Congress expending all its efforts in spending the people's money in the erection of monuments and in celebrations and festivals and carnivals at that time.

Mr. President, as I have said once before, I confess that I have not that profound admiration and respect for patriotism and loyalty that always hoists the old flag on every occasion provided there is a good round appropriation underneath its folds. I am opposed to this because it is a wanton, needless, and improper expenditure of thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars of the people's money, while we to-day are withholding from honest creditors of this Government hundreds and thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars justly owing to them, and for which they are suffering. We are giving these hundreds of thousands of dollars to build monuments, when Jackson and Clay and Webster and Calhoun and Benton, and men of that class, with twenty-eight millions of surplus money in the Treasury and the Government not owing a dollar to any creditor, national or individual, refused to appropriate a dollar.

I simply desired to state my reasons for opposing this bill. I opposed it in committee; I oppose it here. I opposed the bills to which the Senator from New York refers, each and all of them.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President, I will say in answer to some remarks dropped by the Senator from New York that it has been the intention of the Senator from New Jersey and myself for several days to try to get this bill up and I knew nothing of the introduction of the bill to which he referred until this morning, so that my action on this bill has no connection whatever with any action taken on the Saratoga monument bill.

I will say in answer to the Senator from Missouri that we are doing a great many things at this centennial period that Clay and Webster and Calhoun and Benton never thought of doing and that there was no occasion for doing while they were in public service. At this particular period of our history, the centennial period, we should be moved to take a great many patriotic steps. Sir, I feel it my duty to do something to make Americans feel that they have a Government, and therefore I do not feel that I am showing any disrespect whatever to Clay, Calhoun, Webster, and Benton by offering at this centennial period my humble service in the direction in which this bill points.

Now, in regard to the disrespect to the living by indicating by this bill that there is a lack of patriotism in this country at this time, I will say that I am willing to take my share of the responsibility of making that indication. I think if we can by any means stimulate and increase the patriotism of our people it is our duty to do so. I think it is at a low ebb; I believe we are thinking too much of the affairs of every-day life, too much of ourselves, and if we can think a little more of the public good, it will be better for the country and for all of us. I speak for myself; the temptation is to think only of what immediately surrounds us, what is best for our personal interests, what most conserves our comfort, and I think if I can be inspired with more patriotism than I have had, it will be a very fortunate thing for me and a fortunate thing for the work I am trying to do as a public servant. I think if we say to any community that will raise $10,000 "We will give you $10,000 to enable you to erect a Revolutionary monument," we shall have done a very wise thing. There are probably not over half a dozen places in the United States where monuments will be erected.

I differ in toto with the Senator from Missouri on all the points he makes. It is no disrespect to men of the past for us to do things they were not called upon to do. On the semi-centennial anniversary of the birth of our nation men and communities were moved to great rejoicing and at this centennial period it becomes doubly our duty to interest ourselves in all the pageants, displays, and patriotic enactments and work which tend to inspire patriotism. I do not think the patriotism of the country is of such high type as to make it entirely unnecessary for us to stimulate it by all legitimate methods.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, without expressing any opinion just now in regard to the wisdom of this measure, I have a suggestion to make to the Senator from New Jersey who has it in charge with regard to that part of it which relates to the payment of money by this Government to the associations mentioned in the bill. Under the first section of this bill it is provided that for every dollar raised by any association the Treasury of the United States shall pay an additional dollar to aid the object——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of half past one having arrived it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I ask unanimous consent to continue the consideration of this bill.

Mr. INGALLS and others. Regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is called for.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, let me suggest that the Senator from Florida is in the midst of a few remarks which he would like to conclude. I take it no Senator will object to that.

Mr. GARLAND. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida will proceed, there being no objection.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The word "raised" here is not entirely satisfactory to me. The provision is that for every dollar raised by any of these associations the Treasury shall pay over a dollar to them. I think some more stringent provision ought to be in the bill. We know that subscriptions on paper are very frequently taken in enterprises of this kind as equivalent to actual payment. I think it ought to be provided, if it goes into operation, that for each dollar of money actually in hand the Treasury shall pay one dollar. I only make that as a suggestion.

THE GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. GARLAND. A few days ago I gave notice that this morning I should call up the bill known as the Geneva award bill in case there was no appropriation bill to obstruct the way. The morning hour has expired now, and the order of the day is the Post-Office appropriation bill. I wish now to renew this notice for to-morrow, when the appropriation bill will be out of the way, and I hope the Senate will give me consent to-morrow morning to call up this important matter.

PENSIONS TO SOLDIERS OF THE MEXICAN WAR.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to give notice to the Senate that on Monday, after the conclusion of the morning hour, I shall move to suspend all prior and pending orders and take up the bill (S. No. 1753) granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Mexican and other wars therein named, and for other purposes.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 8th instant, approved and signed the following acts and joint resolutions:

An act (S. No. 939) to amend the law relative to the seizure and forfeiture of vessels for breach of the revenue laws;

An act (S. No. 286) for the relief of John S. Cunningham;

An act (S. No. 1133) granting a pension to Michael Hayne;

An act (S. No. 1573) to provide for the furnishing of certain public documents to soldiers' homes;

An act (S. No. 1805) relative to the revolutionary battle-field of Bennington;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 146) to provide for printing and distributing the index of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD semi-monthly; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 143) authorizing the inspection and issue of an American register to the Egyptian steamship Dessoug.

THE PONCA INDIANS.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senate for a few moments to a matter which, in some aspects, is somewhat personal to myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the Senator will proceed.

Mr. DAWES. There was yesterday laid upon the desk of each of the Senators a printed letter of fourteen pages, directed to me personally in the Senate, dated at the Interior Department, and signed by the Secretary of the Interior. It is a criticism upon some remarks which I made here in the Senate recently, and also upon my course as a Senator. I have reread those remarks since this letter has been laid upon the desks of Senators, and I find nothing in them which I desire to qualify or withdraw; on the contrary I reaffirm everything I said on that occasion.

What I have said and what I have done has been in the discharge of a public duty from which I do not intend to be deterred by any such proceeding as this. To this body and to those who sent me here I am accountable for the manner in which I discharge my duty here; but I am not accountable to any executive officer of this Government. So far as in this letter the facts stated in those remarks are called in question, I have only to say further that they are capable of proof by the record. The records of the Interior Department and of the Senate prove them incontrovertibly. So far as those statements rest upon personal memory, this letter has only succeeded in putting the memory of one man against that of another, and no amount of allegation can carry it further or demand from me further reply. I submit a reaffirmation of them all to the judgment of the Senate and the country.

The Secretary of the Interior is restive over the public criticism of his connection with the Ponca business, and those acquainted with the facts do not wonder. I ask the indulgence of the Senate but a few moments to go once for all to the bottom of the Ponca business; the steps are few but certain; and when I shall have reached the bottom of it, the public judgment will have no difficulty in assigning to the author of this letter his proper position in that court where men on trial get their deserts; and whatever that position may be, I am certain it will not be that of public prosecutor.

One thing is admitted by everybody, and that is that a great wrong was inflicted upon the Ponca Indians by their removal to the Indian Territory. The President of the United States admits it, and that it is so grievous as to justify a special message to Congress urging redress of this great grievance during his administration. The Secretary of the Interior admits it, and in this letter boasts that he is the first discoverer of it, a boast that those who are acquainted with the facts will not be inclined to withhold from him. A commission sent by the President to the Indian Territory to inquire what justice and humanity demanded, came back with their report setting forth that great wrong. What is that wrong, and who is responsible for it, are the questions to which I ask the attention of the Senate. The key to it is found in these three lines of a statute of the United States attached to an appropriation bill:

Provided, further, That the Secretary of the Interior may use of the foregoing amounts the sum of $25,000 for the removal of the Poncas to the Indian Territory, and providing a home therein, with the consent of said band.

Subsequently $15,000 was added to this appropriation without changing its phraseology. If there has been any wrong committed by the removal, these words show what that wrong is; it could be in no other way than because they were removed without their consent. If their change of abode, if the removal of these Indians to the Indian Territory and their retention there was with their consent, no one claims that there was any wrong committed. It is because they were removed without their consent that a wrong was inflicted upon them; and I pass to the second and only question to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate, and that is, who is responsible for that wrong?

Under this act of Congress, on the 15th day of the last January of the last administration, six weeks before it went out of power, an agent was sent with written instructions to the Ponca Indians to negotiate for that consent. He made a sorry job enough out of his negotiation. It lasted until the 4th of March, when this agent passed under the control and into the service of the present Secretary of the Interior, the author of this letter. He had accomplished on that day only enough to demonstrate that their consent could not be obtained, and that information was laid before the Department.

The Secretary pleads ignorance of the subsequent outrage which constitutes this wrong. I propose to show by the records in his own Department and the records of the Senate that he not only was conversant with every step in it but that with full knowledge of it all laid before him he ordered it to be done.

On the 5th day of March, 1877, when the present Secretary of the Interior took up the work and took control of the agent, every Ponca Indian was in his home in the Territory of Dakota and on his reservation, for which he had an indefeasible title, then and there protesting his desire to remain in his home. Every step thereafter almost daily was communicated to the Interior Department, mostly, it is true, to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, until the process of forcing the Poncas out of their territory had come to create such a disturbance in this peaceful tribe as to attract the attention of all the peaceful inhabitants of Dakota and of Nebraska in the midst of whom this tribe had had their home for one hundred years, and thereupon they made these representations to the Secretary of the Interior and not to the Indian Bureau.

Alfred L. Riggs, a missionary among them, and now laboring in his work within a few miles of their old abode, whose letter I have before me, wrote on the 20th of March, 1877, to the agent there, setting forth that the Poncas were wholly opposed to going, that the act of Congress under which they were to be removed made the condition that the removal should be with their consent, and stating the wrong about to be inflicted upon them; and the agent on the 22d of March inclosed that letter to the Secretary of the Interior.

On the 10th of April, 1877, Mr. H. Westerman, treasurer of Knox County, in Nebraska, bordering upon this reservation, writes to the Secretary of the Interior:

SPRINGFIELD, DAK., April 10.

HON. CARL SCHURZ,
Secretary of Interior, Washington, D. C.:

The Ponca Indians do not wish to be removed. They have not made a treaty for their lands, but are to be forced off.

The treaty of 1865 cedes and relinquishes to them the lands they now occupy (see U. S. Statutes at Large, volume 14, page 675, article 1,) and gives them right and title thereto.

Please order a suspension of their removal until you receive papers already forwarded setting forth their rights in full. Answer.

H. WESTERMAN.

On the 3d day of April, he had written more fully to the same Secretary of the Interior, thus:

NIOBRARA, NEBR., April 3, 1877.

DEAR SIR: Allow me to call your attention to the Ponca Indians in their poor and helpless condition—about seven hundred and fifty human beings, who have a right to be heard by the Government. The Indians have lived more than a hundred and fifty years where the present reservation is, and for the past eighteen years, I know from personal observation, have been friendly to the whites and the Government. They are more advanced in civilization during this time than any other tribe of Indians I know of, although the Government has done less for the Poncas than for any other Indians.

Lately an agent came from Washington to make a treaty with the Poncas for their removal to the Indian Territory. The Indians do not want to go there. Now, why not leave them where they are? The Ponca Indians have been more protection to the settlers on the frontier of Nebraska than if a regiment of soldiers had been stationed there.

Reform is necessary, particularly in the Indian Department. I have seen agents and committees sent from Washington, who never heard any complaint, but were received by some of the "ring," who took good care that nobody could see them. They returned to Washington and reported nothing. It seems to me the removal of the Poncas is a put-up job by some who want to make money, and some parties in Yankton, Dakota, to secure a market by locating the Sioux where the Poncas are now, and prevent the development of Northern Nebraska. If we are to have Indians on our border, let them be friendly and not hostile. I hope you will issue an order to leave the Poncas on their present reservation, and appoint a committee of men who live on the frontier of Nebraska to examine and investigate this matter; among them I would suggest Joseph Holman, whose name is attached to the treaty made twenty years ago.

Very respectfully, yours,

H. WESTERMAN.

HON. CARL SCHURZ,
Secretary of the Interior,
Washington, District of Columbia.

And he asks the Secretary to inquire for his respectability and reliability of "Hon. A. S. PADDOCK, United States Senator; Hon. ALVIN SAUNDERS, United States Senator; Hon. Frank Welch, M. C.; Hon. P. W. Hitchcock; Hon. John Taffe; Hon. A. W. Hubbard, president First National Bank, Sioux City, Iowa." And then on the 10th he sent further the letter to the Secretary that I just now read. The same Mr. Riggs to whom I before referred, on the 19th day of March, 1877, wrote to the Secretary of the Interior setting out all these facts in a letter which I will read, so that the Secretary may have no difficulty in finding it:

To the Hon. SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, D. C.:

We respectfully call your attention to some facts and circumstances connected with the proposed removal of the Ponca Indians to the Indian Territory which demand your immediate attention.

1. The Poncas have a clear right to the land on which they now are; the right of original possession, guaranteed by two treaties with the United States.

2. They have never relinquished that right, any reported agreement to the contrary notwithstanding.

3. They are wholly opposed to moving to the Indian Territory. Out of deference to the wishes of the Government they were willing to go and look at it, but their visit has confirmed their determination never to move. If they must die, they will die by the graves of their fathers.

4. The act of Congress of 1876, by which their removal was authorized, and $25,000 appropriated for that purpose, expressly provides that it is to be done "with their consent." The appropriation bill of the last session added $15,000 to the former sum, but did not change the condition then imposed.

5. The ostensible reason for the removal of the Poncas—the hostility of the Brule Sioux—is without good foundation; for though they are now enemies, closer neighborhood and the control of the United States authority would quickly make them at peace. The Yankton and Santee Sioux were once at war with the Poncas, when they were living at a distance; but when they came into close proximity neither party could afford war with their next-door neighbor, and they made peace.

6. The white settlements near the Poncas would rather have them than the Brule Sioux for neighbors.

7. The arrangements for their removal are being made with such haste and in such a way, without the advertisement usually required, that the popular impression is that there is something "crooked" in the transaction.

We are therefore convinced that great wrong will be done these Indians and more disgrace accrue to our country by such ruthless disregard of our obligations. And we believe that none would more deeply regret the inevitable result than the honorable officers of the bureau under whose authority the work is being done.

We ask that at least a stay be put upon this movement by telegraph until it can be properly looked into by the Government.

Your obedient servant,

ALFRED L. RIGGS,
Missionary of the American Board, Santee Agency, Nebraska.

MARCH 19, 1877.

At the bottom of this letter is this indorsement:

I hereby certify that (though not knowing to all the facts above stated) I do know that the Poncas as a tribe are bitterly opposed to removal. Believing it would be an outrage to drag them even to a better country, I join in the petition for further investigation. There must be some misunderstanding.

JOHN P. WILLIAMSON,
Missionary of the Presbyterian Church, Yankton Agency, Dakota.

MARCH 19, 1877.

To this was added:

We are glad to indorse the above, with the hope that the Department may be induced to order a delay until proper inquiry can be made.

JOSEPH WARD,
Pastor Congregational Church, Yankton, Dakota.
JOEL A. POTTER,
Ex-Mayor of Yankton.
J. C. McVAY,
President First National Bank, Yankton.

YANKTON, DAKOTA, March 21, 1877.

On the 21st day of March these same two missionaries telegraphed to the Secretary of the Interior:

[Telegram.]

YANKTON, DAKOTA, March 21, 1877.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, D. C.:

Please order stay of proceedings in removal of Poncas until inquiry is made. Removal is against their wishes, and violates two treaties. Particulars mailed.

A. L. RIGGS,
Missionary, Santee Agency.
JOHN P. WILLIAMSON,
Missionary, Yankton Agency.

E. C. Kemble, the United States Indian inspector, on the 22d of March laid the following letter before the Department, addressed to him by Mr. Riggs:

DAKOTA MISSION, AMERICAN BOARD,
Santee Agency, Nebraska, March 20, 1877.

DEAR SIR: Yours of March 16 reached me last night. I thank you much for your full free letter. I am glad to hear from you, and glad to have the opportunity to give you a full explanation of my position on the Ponca question, past and present. I had nothing to do whatever with encouraging the Poncas to hold out against the Government. I have had no opinion on the case until recently, and what I have to say I say to the United States authorities, and not to the Indians. Some of the Ponca chiefs came down to see me the week you were conciling with them; but I was away at Yankton, buying lumber for my new young men's hall, and I was glad of it. They, however, sent a delegation to see me, after they had started with you, to request me to write to Washington for them, which I did and received their answer; but they have never called for the answer.

I think you are mistaken about Indians from our mission going up to stir up trouble. There is only one who could do it, and I am sure he has not been up there for a long time; I think not since your big council. I asked only last Saturday about it.

I presume the Poncas are themselves more hostile to the removal than you think. Yesterday I wrote a letter to Washington on the Ponca matter. I sent it to Rev. J. P. Williamson, asking him to sign it with me. I will tell you all there is in it. But I will first tell why I sent it at all. I had to come to the conviction that the Department is laboring under a misconception of the case, and consequently are compelling you to do things that will work wrong to the Indians, and disgrace the country. I expressly say in my letter that I believe the honorable officers of the bureau, under whom this work is being done, will regret as much as any one the inevitable result. I have written substantially as follows: "First. The Poncas have a right to the land they now occupy, the right of original possession guaranteed by two treaties." Second. They have never relinquished the right; certainly a documentary title cannot be conveyed without "signing it away," which the Poncas have not done. Nor did they understand your verbal agreement with them as you understood it. "Third. They are wholly opposed to going." "Fourth. The acts of Congress on which they are removed make the condition that it shall be with their consent." Fifth. The ostensible reason, the hostility of the Brule Sioux, is without good foundation. You yourself urge that they have been watching against these Sioux to the detriment of their farms. Sixth. The neighboring settlements much prefer that the Poncas should be near them rather than the Brule Sioux. By this I did not mean that all were opposed, but rather that they were decidedly opposed. Seventh. The arrangements for their removal are being pushed with such undue haste and in such a way, without the usual advertising for transportation, that the popular impression is that there is something "crooked" in the transaction. It may be said in answer that haste was necessary. True enough; but there was no necessity precluding the advertisement in the Yankton Daily three or four times.

I state above that such is the popular impression, as is undoubtedly the fact. I have not, however, intended to reflect on your integrity by making such a report, and I may not have guarded it in that particular as I should; of course if the popular impression is correct it does reflect on your judgment. But if wholly incorrect you are wholly vindicated, even in that particular; that is practically so.

Now I have told you the whole—the very worst—that I have thought or said. But I fear that I am too late, and that my protest will come to nothing. It may be best for the Poncas to go south, even if half of them die, as the Pawnees have died; but they should be convinced and be brought to acquiesce in a way they have not done as yet.

If I have done you any wrong in what I have written it is because I had been thinking more of the case of the poor Poncas than of anybody else.

I had also written to some gentlemen of Yankton, my friends, to get their assistance in the matter of my protest. I have therefore sent them your letter this morning, so that they can see both sides of the case, and so that I should do you no injustice.

Allow me to say that I regret, for your own sake, that you have got into that Ponca business, and I sincerely trust you may get through with it safely and righteously.

Your friend,

ALFRED L. RIGGS.

Colonel E. C. KEMBLE.

In their distress these Indians sold thirty ponies and employed counsel to come on here to Washington and personally intercede with the Secretary of the Interior for permission to remain in their old home. That lawyer left on the 20th or 21st of April. I now read his testimony before a committee of this body:

A. I think I left there about the 20th or 21st of April. When I got here I found Senator PADDOCK, of our State. I had expected to find Senator SAUNDERS, who had just lately become Senator. I thought that if I stated the matter to them they would have an investigation made. I brought letters of introduction with me. When I got here Senator SAUNDERS was not here.

Q. Was Congress in session then?

A. No, sir; Congress had adjourned. In the spring of 1877 there was no session of Congress after the 4th of March. Senator PADDOCK went with me, and we called on the Commissioner of Indian Affairs—Commissioner Smith. I represented the matter to him quite fully, and explained to him that I thought there was no question, and that the citizens out there thought there was no question, that advantage was being taken of these Indians; that the agent and officers there were not reporting the facts: that the Indians never had agreed to leave their lands, but, on the contrary, were very much opposed to leaving them. Whatever was the agreement at the council before the chiefs went to the Indian Territory, it was certain that at this time, after the return of the chiefs from the Indian Territory, at the time they called upon me to act for them, they had decided that they did not want to go to the Indian Territory on any consideration. I explained to Commissioner Smith that the chiefs had been to the Indian Territory, and had become greatly dissatisfied, and left the men who had them in charge, and walked back, a distance of something like five hundred miles, to the Omaha reservation, in Nebraska.

Q. You explained to the Commissioner that the Poncas were utterly opposed to going to the Indian Territory at all?

A. Yes, sir; at that time, after the return of the chiefs.

Q. What did the Commissioner answer?

A. I do not think that he made any very decided answer at that time. We then called on Secretary Schurz and explained the matter to him.

Q. Who went to call on Secretary Schurz?

A. I went with Senator PADDOCK. I think Commissioner Smith came in while we were there. I fully explained the matter to Secretary Schurz. Senator PADDOCK vouched for my respectability, and said he had letters indorsing my statements from a number of men with whom he had been acquainted ever since he had been in the State. The Secretary at the first interview promised that he would look into the matter. I think it was at this interview, after this promise, that Commissioner Smith came in; and he made some remark to the effect that the agents were the sworn officers of the Government and that their reports must be the basis of all official action. I tried to induce the Secretary and the Commissioner—I am not sure whether at this interview or the next day—to delay action and select any man or men that they might have confidence in to go out there and investigate whether the Poncas were willing to go to the Indian Territory or not. Commissioner Smith for some reason or other was very desirous of their removal. The Secretary, however, was inclined at first to delay the matter and make an investigation; but he finally made up his mind that his official information was of such a nature that he ought to act.

This gentleman says that the Senator from Nebraska on my right [Mr. PADDOCK] took him to the Interior Department, introduced him, vouched for his reliability, and seconded his request that the Secretary would stay what was called this inhuman proceeding long enough to send a commission of one or more persons in whom he had confidence to the territory, to there investigate and satisfy him. I make this statement in the presence of the Senator from Nebraska, and if I fall into an error I know that the Senator will not hesitate to correct me. I assume, therefore, that in the main I am stating this transaction as it accords with his recollection.

Mr. PADDOCK. Mr. President, it is true, as stated in the testimony given by Mr. Draper, to which my friend has referred, that I did call with him upon the Secretary of the Interior in respect to this matter; it is true that at other times, when letters and petitions were sent to me, I did call to see the Secretary of the Interior upon the same subject, and did protest against the removal of the Poncas; but it is due to the Secretary of the Interior to say in this connection that always he manifested a disposition to do what seemed to be best and proper in the case, but at the same time he uniformly said that under the law which had been enacted before he came into the office of Secretary of the Interior he felt himself obliged to take such action as the law itself seemed to require, looking to the removal of these Indians to the Indian Territory. I felt it myself to be a very great hardship. At the time the law was enacted, I so expressed myself in the Senate very emphatically. It seemed to me to be a very improper thing to do; but there was a complication growing out of the treaty of 1868, which gave the great Sioux tribes that particular reservation, wrongfully, improperly, against all law and all justice, which seemed to make it necessary for the removal of the Poncas, and that was the plea on which the legislation was had. The legislation was wrong beyond any question whatever. That I must say.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator will observe that I am on a question of knowledge, and I simply would like to ask him if he did go with this gentleman and indorse his reliability? The law is plain.

Mr. PADDOCK. I did then and do now indorse his reliability.

Mr. DAWES. Then a reliable attorney-at-law, appointed by the Poncas and paid out of the very means of their livelihood, their own ponies, came here and set forth to this Secretary of the Interior the facts in this case, implored him to stay these proceedings long enough to ascertain for himself by special commission what were the facts in the case. I think I am authorized by the Senator from Nebraska on my left [Mr. SAUNDERS] to state to the Senate that he also appeared before the Secretary of the Interior and represented to him in substance that the Poncas desired to stay in their old home, that the white people round about them desired that they should stay, and that their removal against their consent would be a great hardship upon them.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. President, I did so state to the Senator, I believe, and to others. I visited the Secretary of the Interior shortly after I came into the Senate, and shortly after he was installed into that office, once, I think, if not twice, with my colleague, and at one other time alone, and asked him to stay the proceedings in the case. I told him that the white people were satisfied with these Indians; that they were a peaceable tribe of Indians; that they had made it their boast that they had never shed a white man's blood, and, inasmuch as they were more industrious than most of the other Indians, there was a disposition on the part of the people of my State to let them remain undisturbed and finally become citizens. In fact, some of them were applying at that time for homesteads.

The statement was made to me that they did not want to go, that they wanted to remain where they were, and on that account particularly—for I had no interest in them—I made an appeal to the Department not to send them to the Indian Territory at that time.

It is due to the Secretary of the Interior to state, as has been stated by my colleague, that in answer to that the Secretary said he found when he came into office a law or an appropriation that had been made for that purpose, and he felt himself instructed, therefore, to carry it out, the money having been appropriated for that particular purpose.

I will state also that the Secretary of the Interior had other evidence on that subject; that he had learned that the Indians did want to go; that some parties had so stated to him. I gave him the best information I could, and I insisted that they ought not to be sent down there against their will and that I had heard they were not disposed to go. I thought there was a mistake made at that time. I thought so then and I think so now. At the same time, I wish to do the justice to the Secretary of the Interior of saying that I believe in the main the management he has put forth in regard to the Indians has been looking to their best interest, and particularly he has advised that they be made citizens and allowed to hold lands in severalty, so that they may finally become self-supporting. I approve everything he has done in that direction. I did not approve of the other action at the time and regretted exceedingly that he felt himself bound to take the course he did.

Mr. HOAR. I would like to ask the Senator from Nebraska for my own satisfaction and that of the public, one question. As I understand, the law which provided for the removal of the Ponca Indians contained this condition, "provided they give their consent." I understand that the Secretary of the Interior has repeatedly affirmed that he is now satisfied they did not give their consent, so that their entire removal was in violation of law. Now what it is desired to know is whether it be proved that the attorney of the Indians, vouched for by the Senator's colleague as a respectable and trustworthy person, went with the Senator's colleague to the Secretary before the order to press their removal was given, and informed him that they had not given their consent? That, I understand the Senator's colleague to state. Now what I desire to know is if the Senator also stated to the Secretary that from his information, derived from information from the neighborhood, he was satisfied that they had not given their consent?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I reiterate what I said before, that I had heard from citizens living in that part of the State that the Indians did not want to go, and I said so to the Secretary.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator expressed his own belief to that effect?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I did not go with this attorney, and I do not know anything about what he may have said; but I said to the Secretary that I believed the Indians did not want to go and that we protested—those were about the words we used—against their being sent away contrary to their will.

Mr. DAWES. I do not desire to be diverted——

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. If the Senator will allow me to ask him a question, what official information, if any, was in the Department at the time the order for the removal of the Poncas was made in regard to their consent to such removal?

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator will keep me in mind of that interrogatory, I will answer it before I conclude. I am not to be diverted from the question, whether the Secretary was ignorant of the subsequent outrage or not. There was no outrage at all if the Poncas gave their consent. The law authorized their removal upon one condition, and one only, and unless that was complied with they could no more be removed from their land than I can from mine. It was because of the violation of that condition that an outrage admitted by the Secretary of the Interior was committed. I have shown that when the Secretary came into office, assumed control of this agent, and took him into his service every Ponca Indian was on his proper territory. They were removed after that. If by their own consent, no outrage was committed. If without their consent, the outrage was committed. That the Secretary knew all the facts that make up the outrage is what I am trying to impress upon the Senate. I have it from all these representations to him now on record in the Department. I have it from the statement of their own attorney, vouched to be a reliable man. I have it further from the man who did the act. He got disgusted with his work, there was so much interference with him. Although he entered with zeal into the work of removing them without their consent, yet the interference with him was so great that he became disgusted and telegraphed to the Department to stand firm. The Department at first, on the representation of this attorney, felt disposed to make investigation, but the next morning informed him that the work must go on. The agent stopped in his work and came to Washington. Let us hear what he said on the 12th day of February, 1880:
